What Stutz claims, the facts prove

THE New Safety Stutz has been "idealized" by engineering rather than by the King's English.

To substantiate each claim for the New Safety Stutz we are able to point to an actual advance in engineering design or mechanical construction.

For this basically different and fundamentally improved automobile we claim the following:

- 1 That it is the safest, most secure car in the world for driver and passengers;
- 2 That it has greater "road-adhesiveness", is much less likely to overturn, and is more sure-footed than any other automobile ever designed;
- 3 That it is the most "gentle" car to handle, and the most nearly effortless car to drive in existence; and
- 4 That it is the most comfortable, non-fatiguing automobile for driver and passenger, over long, hard drives that ever has been built.

These claims, again, are each and all supported by definite, visible and demonstrable features of the New Safety Stutz engineering.

And each local sales representative is trained to explain why the New Safety Stutz is so basically advanced in design and performance. And to demonstrate its superior roadability in every sense of the word.

Regardless of what car you drive or intend to buy, we urge you now to investigate Stutz claims and Stutz facts. It is not too much to say that you owe it to yourself, as an investor in automobiles, to do so.

The New Safety Stutz is permanently protected against theft, by The Fedco System, without cost to the car owner.

An exclusive feature is Loss-of-Use Insurance, paying the car owner five dollars per day, up to thirty days, for loss of the car's use through theft. This also is without cost to the car owner.

The entire car has Underwriters' Class A rating on both fire and theft.

Eight body styles, including 7-passenger models, designed and constructed under the supervision of Brewster of New York.

The New
TURNING POINT
IN MOTOR CAR DESIGN

The new, finer Chrysler "70" is a turning point in motor car body design—forecasting the new vogue in motoring for years to come.

Newer, more exquisitely graceful bodies of exclusive Chrysler design—newer, more distinctive silhouette—newer, luxury of comfort—newer, greater riding ease—newer richness of upholstery—newer, finer hardware and fittings—newer refinements in controls and lighting—newer, more attractive color blendings far in advance of current harmonies.

And with this newer appearance the new, finer Chrysler "70" offers the proved superiority of performance, dependability, economy, and long life which are Chrysler.

For it is basically the same Chrysler "70" chassis, save for valuable refinements, which is more emphatically than ever years ahead of contemporary achievement.

HYPOCRISY

By Thomas Beer

In the form of a conversation, the author of "The Mauve Decade" surveys the doings in Cerebralia, and comments shrewdly thereon.

COMSTOCK THE LESS

By Henry F. Pringle

The sad tale of the infiltration of respectability into the stronghold of the Pure and Holy, from which the Great Anthony used to thunder terrific volleys of denunciation at the enemies of Christian virtue, but from which only pathetic protests issue now.

THE PLAGUE OF LAWS

By William P. Helm, Jr.

A FIRST-CLASS FIGHTING MAN

By George Sterling

His name was Pete M'Coy, a gorgeous pugilist of the old school, who fought for blood, and not for movie rights.

THE AMERICAN MERCURY

THE NEW KENT EDITION OF

JOSEPH CONRAD

A PERFECT GIFT TO BOOK-LOVERS WHOSE TASTE YOU RESPECT

This rare edition at a saving of $140.75 over the limited autographed Sun Dial Edition

"HERE, surely, if ever, is genius!" Hugh Walpole burst out, after reading one of Conrad's novels. "There is no one like him, there is no one remotely like him!" H. L. Mencken once wrote.

"How I envy those who are reading him for the first time!" said Gouverneur Morris.

Such is the temptation of all who love to read Conrad. They cannot contain themselves. They burst into superlatives. John Galsworthy, H. G. Wells, Irvin Cobb, Mary Austin, Christopher Morley, Rex Beach—and scores of other writers too numerous even to mention—all alike, at one time or another, have acclaimed him as the greatest master of fiction of our day.

And even more striking than the enthusiasm of his fellow-craftsmen is the adoration—no other word will serve!—in which Conrad is held by tens of thousands of intelligent people all over the world.

What more thoughtful Christmas gift can you make, to one whose taste you respect, than a complete set of the works of this great Master?

The new Kent Edition offered here is a set you may be proud to present. Most book-lovers have heard of the famous Sun Dial Edition of Conrad. It was autographed and limited to 735 sets, each selling for $175.75. Wealthy book collectors snapped it up, paying a total of over $129,000. (Such was the judgment of connoisseurs of Conrad being ranked with the immortals.)

The new Kent Edition contains everything in the Sun Dial Edition, including the same illuminating special prefaces written by Conrad to each book. It is printed from the same style and size of type. There are, however, two additional volumes in the Kent Edition, Suspense and Tales of Hearsay. But instead of selling for $175.75, the price is only $35, and even this may be paid in convenient small amounts if desired.

If you wish to obtain this collection, either for yourself or for a gift, it is advisable to order immediately, for at this extraordinary price the edition will unquestionably be oversubscribed before Christmas. Simply use the coupon below or write a letter. The set will be sent with privilege of return within ten days if it does not meet your expectation in every respect. Address

Startling Innovation

The New

THIRTEENTH EDITION

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA

In the NEW FORM
at a Saving of 40% NOW!

Amazing Bargain Offer

WITH the publication of the new Thirteenth Edition, the ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA has inaugurated a radical change in publishing policy—a change which makes it possible for YOU to secure this new Britannica AT ONCE—at a sweeping reduction in price!

Why This Offer is Made

Hitherto, it has been the custom of all publishers to bring out new important works in a single high-priced edition.

But, to follow old-time custom would mean that thousands and thousands of persons of moderate income would be compelled to put off buying their sets of the new Britannica for many months—perhaps for years.

Because the Britannica is primarily an educational institution—both the editors and publishers were anxious to give it the widest possible distribution.

And so it was decided to give everyone an equal opportunity to obtain this complete new 13th Edition now, at a sweeping reduction of more than 40% as compared with the more expensively bound Cambridge Issue.

How You Can Save 40%

To give YOU this amazing opportunity 15,000 sets of the complete new 13th Edition have been bound in the NEW FORM—a method first introduced by this Company two years ago when more than 60,000 sets of the former or 12th Edition were sold.

The NEW FORM is in many respects the most attractive, compact and convenient form in which the ENCYCLOPÆDIA

BRITANNICA has ever been issued. You get:

- (1) Large type, easy to read.
- (2) Complete text (nothing omitted).
- (3) All the new and original plates, maps, etc.
- (4) Sweeping reduction (40% below price of Cambridge Issue).

How We Can Do It

First, by mass production; and by placing huge orders for all materials far in advance.

Second, by binding the 32 volumes as 16, saving 50% of the binding cost.

Third, by printing the NEW FORM from the same plates used in the higher-priced Cambridge Issue, thus saving the cost of resetting 33,000 pages of type.

What You Get

You get in the NEW FORM everything contained in the more expensive Cambridge Issue—and at an amazing bargain:—

45,000 separate articles, by more than 2,500 world-famous authorities. Albert Einstein, Henry Ford, Bernard Shaw, Marshal Foch, Sigmund Freud, Andrew W. Mellon, L. Trotsky, Joseph Caillaux, Dr. Adolph Lorenz, Senator Marconi, George Eastman, Mme. Curie, Dame Millicent Fawcett, and Suzanne Lenglen, are among the contributors.

You get also the full record of man's achievement during the "short but tremendous epoch" from 1910 to 1926.

This 80-Page Booklet FREE

Before you risk a dollar, you can prove to yourself that this great work is indispensable to you. We have prepared a fascinating 80-page Booklet which we'll send you FREE. Write for it—TODAY.

It contains specimen pages from the new Britannica; describes the NEW FORM (16 double vols.) also the Cambridge Issue (32 vols.); and explains our Easy Payment Plan by which anyone can now afford to own the new Britannica.

Typographic Treasures

F COURSE you love rare books. All people of culture do. But the collecting of fine old books and manuscripts is limited to-day to the fortunate few who enjoy great wealth and abundant leisure. The less fortunate, meaning cultured people of limited means, are directed to libraries and museums, and allowed to gaze at the typographic treasures through a glass case, guarded by frigid attendants. Or perhaps they are offered, by publishers of de luxe editions, sumptuous reprints purporting to be exact facsimiles, which mayhap deceive the eye but in reality satisfy no sense whatsoever.

It has remained for FOLIOPHILES, an organization of expert bibliophiles and collectors, to originate a different idea. Instead of these pallid imitations, they offer genuine leaves from original books—leaves not from works that simply are old, but are representative documents that have marked historic stages in the development of typography, engraving, and calligraphy, or veritably created epochs in the history of human thought. Without exception these are taken from rare, often priceless, books and manuscripts, and are absolutely authentic. There is not one facsimile among them.

These leaves have been assembled in attractive Portfolios, four of which have now been issued. Each Portfolio measures 10 x 13 inches, and contains, besides an introductory page, fifteen (or twenty) rare leaves, each one of which is enclosed in a folder of Japanese vellum bearing a brief, scholarly description. The type is hand-set, the "Portfolio boxes" are hand-made—everything, in short, is harmonious with the spirit of the past as reflected in these folios of a bygone age.

Our first announcement appeared in the MERCURY last March, since which time Portfolios III and IV have been completed. Unfortunately, Portfolios I and II are now nearly exhausted, so that those who wish to possess all four should send in their orders at once.

Portfolio No. 1 is confined to English literature and includes such rare and interesting examples as a Breviary used in Salisbury Cathedral during Queen Mary's reign, Darcie's translation of the "Annalles of Queen Elizabeth," the first Edition of Milton's "Paradise Lost," the first Popular Edition of the "King James" Bible, the London "Evening Post" of two centuries ago, the first Edition of Scott's "Marmion," etc., etc. In all, twenty examples.

In Portfolio II, which embraces the first three centuries of Continental printing and bookmaking, are examples from a manuscript Breviary of the Fifteenth Century, two beautiful incunabula with artistic rubrics, fine examples from such celebrated printers as Amerbach, Stephanus, Aldus, Froben, Plantin and Elzevir, and from cities as far removed from one another as Antwerp and Venice, Basle and Salamanca, Amsterdam and Lyons. In all, twenty examples.

Portfolio III is Oriental, and contains some glorious examples of Eastern calligraphy, besides printed pages. Rare leaves from Syriac, Armenian, and Persian MSS. are included; also an example of early Hebrew printing in Constantinople, specimens from two Korans, a Javanese rubricated MS., a Burmese taliput leaf, etc., etc. In all, fifteen examples, exclusive of several specimens of native printed text, added for purposes of comparison.

Portfolio IV, perhaps the most notable of all, is devoted exclusively to early woodcuts and copper engravings from the 15th Century onwards, and will delight every collector of old prints. A leaf, with woodcut, from the "Chronicarum Supplementum" of Bergomensis (Venice, 1486), a leaf, with one or more woodcuts, from the "Hortus Sanitatis" (Strassburg, 1517), and a leaf, with woodcut, from Coci's glorious edition of Livy (Saragossa, 1520) are among the fifteen examples contained in this Portfolio.

The price for each of these Portfolios is still $20.00 (carriage charges prepaid), or $75.00 for the four, but only for a limited time. All future Portfolios will range in price from $25.00 up, and even now we have one in preparation that will sell at $100.00. Mail the memorandum below for full details, or, better still, enclose your cheque and secure one or all of these beautiful Portfolios.

As a gift for a bookloving or fastidious friend, we cannot overestimate the appropriateness of any of these Portfolios. The only question is, will you be able to bear parting with one? That we cannot answer.

The Gift to send to a Literary Friend.

THE gift that you would choose for a literary friend seems obvious enough. Yet how hard it is to choose just the right books to suit his taste. A visit to a well-stocked bookstore will only intensify the difficulty. Perhaps it will help you to realise that your friend himself often has had the same experience.

To him, as to yourself, advice about books contained in "The Times" (of London) Literary Supplement would prove invaluable; an annual subscription would be the best gift of all.

"THE TIMES" LITERARY SUPPLEMENT is regarded by booklovers everywhere as indispensable. Its impartial reviews and criticisms are considered to be the most reliable information obtainable about new books.

The leading articles on some subject of current interest; the notes on sales, and complete bibliography; and other special features that it gives week by week have earned for it a position of the greatest esteem among literary circles.

"The Bibelot"—The World's Strangest Library

IMAGINE how thrilling it would be to have at your fingertips the rarest treasures of literature the world has ever known! Think what a pleasure to reach up on your own book shelves and take down some inspired masterpiece that has been buried in the dust of centuries—or suppressed by prudish opinion!

What greater pride than to say to your friends: "Here is a lyric of Sappho that I dare you to find elsewhere!" Or, "behold these suppressed writings of Kipling! See this from Wilde; that from Villon"—genius that runs the entire gamut of love, romance, philosophy, art, travel, during the last 2,000 years!

Explorer of Lost Masterpieces

Yet now, thanks to Thomas Bird Mosher, discoverer of lost masterpieces, these treasures can all be yours.

At the age of 13 Mosher was sent to sea for five years in his father's clipper with only a score of books for his mind's companionship. From that experience came Mosher's love of adventure and of rare, fine literature.

He became an explorer of lost masterpieces. He delved into private libraries, into dank, out-of-the-way book shops—unearthing gems of forgotten literature such as our world had never seen.

Great Masters of All Ages

Before he had finished Mosher had gathered together in his library 10,000 volumes of the rarest reading the taste of genius could select. Sappho, Casanova, Balzac, Omar Khayyam, Blake, Villon, Swinburne, Dowson, Oscar Wilde, etc.—all were there in volumes privately printed, rare first editions that a fortune could not buy.

Every month for twenty years Mosher sent out to his friends a little magazine—The Bibelot—from his private library. Each issue contained, in the finest printing imaginable, a choice selection of literature, either a lost treasure he had discovered or some exquisite selection from well-known literature. The Bibelot soon became famous. The little circle of Mosher's friends gradually widened until it encompassed the globe.

Mosher died a few years ago. The Bibelot is now being republished in twenty volumes which duplicate the original issues in beauty of binding and printing.

No similar library has ever been gathered before. The reading of the Bibelot entertains and distinguishes like travel which goes into the quaint villages, the forbidden cities and colorful seaports where life is always new.

Send at Once

Do you want to read something that is so rare as to be really and captivatingly new? Then make sure of learning about Mosher's Bibelot. Send for the booklet "Distinguished Reading." It is entirely Free. The publication of the Bibelot will be limited. So also is the edition of the entertaining Free book. The coupon Today will insure your copy. Wm. H. EUROPE'S MOST FAMOUS METHOD OF LEARNING TO SPEAK FRENCH

"HOW I wish that I could speak French!" How often have you heard those words! How often have you wished that you, too, could speak French!

The question has always been, "How can I learn, in a short time, to speak French correctly, so that foreigners will understand me?" Certainly not in school by going through a grammar and learning innumerable rules and irregular verbs!

The great house of Hugo, known throughout Europe, has conducted language institutes in the greater cities for more than a century. Millions of Hugo language books have been sold. Thousands of Europeans have learned to speak foreign languages by the remarkable Hugo method.

The Famous Hugo Method Has Now Been Brought to This Country

It will enable you to speak French like a Frenchman! This method requires little time and little effort. It involves no laborious study. No tiresome rules and grammatical constructions. You actually learn to speak French sentences in your very first lesson.

HUGO'S FAMOUS "FRENCH AT SIGHT"

24 Fascinating Lessons by Mail—Special Introductory Offer

Until you have seen the Hugo course, you cannot possibly realize how easy it is to learn to speak French by this unique method! You progress so naturally that you do not feel that you are studying at all! Correct pronunciation and cultured accent are taught by an ingenious device.

By devoting only a few minutes a day at home to these easy, fascinating lessons, you quickly find yourself able to carry on a conversation in correct French.

To all who enroll promptly for the wonderful Hugo course, we will give, with no additional cost, an imported French dictionary of 50,000 words, so that you can more easily add to your ever increasing vocabulary.

The Entire Course for $12.00. The Hugo "French at Sight" course consists of twenty-four scientifically planned lessons. In order to acquaint Americans with this wonderfully successful method, the entire course is now offered at the amazingly low cost of only $12.00—on convenient terms of only $2.00 a month.

Examine the Course FREE

The coupon below will bring you the entire course of 24 lessons and the dictionary for free examination. You can return them in 5 days, or send only $2.00 initial payment, and then $2.00 a month until $12.00 has been paid. Don't miss this exceptional opportunity.

The Story of the Evolution of LOVE

Now translated - this monumental book sold over 150,000 copies in Germany

THE most widely recognized popular and truly scientific book on Love ever published is now translated from the German into forceful idiomatic English. Conceived in a brilliant and artistic setting it is courageously frank and scientifically truthful. It is a strong narrative of facts—scientific, psychological, and spiritual, “addressed to all rational persons who have the courage to form a philosophy of life for themselves.”

The distinguished author says that he wants to discuss “Love’s ascent through the ages. How love came into being in the animal. And how love became man. Man in his crudeness and man in spirit. I must narrate matter both crude and sweet to you.”

And here are some of the subjects treated: Love and Religion; Love and Art; How love begins in art; The meaning of the chromosomes; How old is man? The love of the Ichthyosaurus; Relics of primitive love; The first visible evidence of love on this planet; The nature of emotion; The love romance of the tape worm; The worm that eats its mother after birth; The animal in man; Polygamy; polyandry and monogamy; Communal marriage; The wonder of creation.

Ask your bookseller to show you this book. If he hasn’t it in stock we shall be glad to send it

BROKEN NECKS

by Ben Hecht

CONTAINING more "1001 Afternoons"—
The brutal throb, the crude, poetical lusts of the American city, fill these ironic stories written by the author of Erick Dorn and Humpty Dumpty.

LOVE OF MYRRHINE AND KONALLIS

and Other Prose-Poems

by Richard Aldington

Mr. Richard Aldington has gathered in this volume, for the first time, all his published and unpublished prose-poems. "Love of Myrrhine and Konallis" has never been published before. The edition consists of 1010 numbered copies, five hundred for England and the balance for America. It is hand-set and distinctively bound. The first 150 copies autographed by the Author, priced at $10.00. The balance at $7.50. [This book will not be published in England]

VICTOR HUGO— GOLGOTHA

by Edgar Saltus

The edition consists of 310 numbered copies. The first 80 copies contain an original cancelled check, signed by Edgar Saltus, price $15.00. The balance, $10.00.

SONNETS OF A MINNESINGER

and Other Lyrics

by J. U. Nicolson

These delightfully poignant sonnets by the author of "The King of the Black Isles," America's romantic poet, form a sequence relating two stories of passion—the first ending in bitterness and cynicism, the second carrying the love of man and woman to a plane far above the merely sexual.

$2.00

TOP O' THE COLUMN

by Keith Preston

(Author of "Types of Pan," "Splinters," etc.)

Humorous and sardonic poems, with quips and jests at the folly of man. Mr. Preston's lines have the rollicking mellowness of Austin Dobson and the keen, epigrammatic turn of phrase of Ben Jonson.

$1.50

DIE SCHÖNSTE LENGEVITCH

by Kurt M. Stein

DROLL, delightfully humorous and Lardneresque observations in rhyme on the foibles and peculiarities of the "so-called human race." This collection, written in a German-English jargon, created by the author, includes the well-known "International Operas."

The BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB

A New Unique Service

What it is and what it does for you

CHAIRMAN

SUPPOSE that every month the best new book published were delivered to you by the postman, just like a magazine. Suppose this "best book" were one which you would not, under any circumstances, care to miss reading. If such a book were sent to you every month, you could be certain that, without effort or trouble, you would always keep abreast of the leading books published throughout the year.

How often do outstanding books appear, widely discussed and widely recommended, books you are anxious to read and fully intend to read when you "get around to it," but which nevertheless you miss! Why is it you disappoint yourself so frequently in this way?

The true reason lies in your habits of book-buying. Through carelessness, or through the driving circumstances of a busy life, you simply overlook obtaining books that you really want to read. Or you live in a district remote from bookstores, where it is impossible to get the best new books without difficulty.

This need be true no longer. The Book-of-the-Month Club will place in your hands every month the best book published that month, whether fiction or non-fiction. And if the book you receive in any month proves to be one you would not have chosen yourself, you may exchange it for a book you prefer, from a list of other good new books simultaneously recommended.

CHRISTOPHER MORLEY

The "best book" each month is chosen for you by a group of unbiased critics and writers, whose judgment as to books and whose catholicity of taste have been demonstrated for many years before the public. The members of this Selecting Committee are: Henry Seidel Canby, Chairman; Heywood Broun, Dorothy Canfield, Christopher Morley, and William Allen White.

These individuals have no connection with the Book-of-the-Month Club, except to act as a Selecting Committee. The new books of all publishers are submitted to them each month. They read these books independently, agree among themselves each month as to which is the "best", and it is forthwith sent to every subscriber of the Book-of-the-Month Club. With it there always goes some interesting comment, by members of the committee, both about the "book-of-the-month" and other new books recommended.

DOROTHY CANFIELD

The price at which the books are billed to you is in every case the publisher's retail price. There is no charge for the service itself.

Already several thousand busy men and women—indeed, some of the most prominent people in the country—have become subscribers to this service. Those who join it at this time are placed in the category of "charter" subscribers, with special privileges which it will not be possible to offer later.

If you are interested in the idea, and wish to consider becoming a "charter" subscriber, write for our prospectus, in which the details of the service are fully outlined. It will completely convince you of one thing: that without effort, without extra expense and without limiting you in your choice of books, the plan makes certain that you will "keep up" with the best literature of the day. If it does not in every respect meet your expectation, you are protected by the privilege of cancellation after trial. Send for this prospectus, using the coupon below or a letter. Your request will involve you in no obligation.

Your children's questions—how do you answer them? Mail coupon for free book.

THESE children have The Book of Knowledge in their home. It is a delight to them every moment of the day, and is turning their eager curiosity into important knowledge. Their teacher will tell you they give her clear and intelligent answers. They have made a long start in the race for knowledge.

Beginning with the Wonder Questions they go from one to another of the 18 story-like departments of The Book of Knowledge: Familiar Things, The Earth, Animal Life, Plant Life, Our Own Life, Things To Make And Do, Our Country, Other Countries, Literature, Fine Arts, Stories, Poetry—all the really essential knowledge of the world, told and pictured so simply and clearly that a child can understand it, and made so interesting that the child loves to read it.

Back of every child's success at school there is the influence of home, and of well-selected home reading.

The BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE

Here is the ideal link between school and home, creating better work at school; happier hours at home.

This wonderful plan is the idea of a father who loved his child and knew its needs. He drew to his help other parents of like desire and long experience in writing for children. Together they studied the mind of the child in his effort to find out everything he wants to know. From their discoveries The Book of Knowledge grew. Children do not have to be urged to read and consult it. They recognize it as their own book, really made for them.

Each one of the great departments is an open door into a new field of knowledge, your child will open the door of his choice, and be guided step by step from the simpler to the more profound ideas and truths.

Send the coupon for section containing questions, pictures and story-articles from The Book of Knowledge. Contents: Animals, Plants, Fish, Insects, Industries, etc.; How Long Do Animals Live? Where Does the Rain Go? Three Ways the Earth Moves; etc. Show it to the children. See what they think of it.

BIOGRAPHY

MY HERESY.

By William Montgomery Brown. The John Day Co.
$2 7½ x 5; 273 pp. New York

Bishop Brown took to reading Darwin and Marx late in life, and was greatly shaken up. His trial for heresy followed, and, as will be recalled, he was deposed as a Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church. His book shows him to be an amiable and honest, but somewhat innocent and moony old man. He is now a Bishop in the so-called Old Catholic Church.

THE FAMILY LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

By Charles Moore. The Houghton Mifflin Company
$5 9 x 5¾; 250 pp. Boston

The author, who is head of the manuscript division of the Library of Congress, has got together a great mass of interesting and unfamiliar matter about Washington, and sets it forth in a clear and orderly manner. A chapter of unusual value is the one on the migrations of the Washington family. There are scores of illustrations.

LINCOLN'S PARENTAGE AND CHILDHOOD.

By Louis A. Warren. The Century Company
$2.50 7¾ x 5¾; 366 pp. New York

The author's thesis is that Lincoln's father, Thomas, was not actually the loafer of legend, but an industrious and highly respectable man. To the support of it he brings forward an immense mass of hitherto unavailable evidence, largely dredged from the county court records of Kentucky. He has unearthed no less than 550 court records showing the names of Lincoln or Hanks, and 1000 other documents.

BILL NYE: His Own Life Story.

Continuity by Frank Wilson Nye. The Century Company
$4 9 x 5¾; 412 pp. New York

This, the first biography of Nye, who died in 1896, is made up mainly of extracts from his own articles and letters, with explanatory bridges between them by his son. There are many illustrations.

A SON OF THE BOWERY.

By Charles Stelzle. The George H. Doran Company
$3.50 8¾ x 5¾; 335 pp. New York

Mr. Stelzle was born of poor parents on the East Side, and after many hardships achieved success. He is now a well-known and respectfully listened to social worker, Prohibitionist and evangelist. His wide experiences have taught him a good many things. For example, he is convinced that "slowly but surely the masses of the people are coming into their own. No human power can stop their onward march, and no divine power will." Again, he thinks that there are a lot of unsolved problems that must be solved, and that the Church is the only agency that can lead the way to their proper solution, for, among other things, it "offers a freer platform for a man with a real message than he can find anywhere else." Of this last he has a "strong conviction."

THE LIFE, WORK AND EVIL FATE OF GUY DE MAUPASSANT.

By Robert Harbrough Sherard. Brentano's
$4.50 8¾ x 5¾; 399 pp. New York

This is a good job. The author sets out to present a picture of the extraordinary man, de Maupassant, and not a critical evaluation of his work—though his fugitive criticisms are all shrewd—, and he accomplishes his task very well. He is not obsessed with a desire to "explain" things. He simply tells the story—and it is a most engrossing one, indeed. There are numerous excellent reproductions of photographs.

THE SCIENCES

PROBLEMS OF HUMAN REPRODUCTION.

By Paul Popenoe. The Williams & Wilkins Company
$2.50 7¼ x 4¾; 218 pp. New York

Chapters on embryology, the determination of sex, the hygiene of pregnancy, sterility, impotence, circumcision, and the secondary sexual differences between man and woman. There is little in the book that is new, and that little is dubious, but in the main it is sensibly written, and should have some value.

WORDS ANCIENT AND MODERN.

By Ernest Weekley. E. P. Dutton & Company
$2 7¾ x 4¾; 163 pp. New York

Seventy-four interesting and instructive notes upon the etymology and later history of as many words, most of them native English, but a few of them loan-words. Mr. Weekley's authority as an etymologist gives even his speculations a high value; here he is mainly on the firm ground of precise knowledge. Among the words discussed are bloody, democracy, gossamer, haphazard, Philistine, quince, sergeant, soviet, uproar, yeoman and yon.

EUROPE SINCE WATERLOO

¶ A tremendous panoramic history of a century of great events, from Napoleon and the Holy Alliance to Hindenberg and the League of Nations. History told with color and drama and suspense, in a vigorous marching style.

¶ Dr. Davis's ROOTS OF THE WAR has been one of the most widely read non-fiction books of many years. In it he disclosed a rare coordination of scholarly authority with pictorial imagination. He revivifies history. He makes it live—as history did live while it was being enacted.

By
DAVIS

¶ EUROPE SINCE WATERLOO is built around great men and great events, rather than vague, imponderable "forces" which have no actuality. Through more than nine hundred pages the tremendous story moves forward, a pageant of kings and conquistadores, of politicians, plunderers and patriots, of schemers and dreamers who moved the fates of nations.

¶ Illustrated and maps, index, bibliography. Royal octavo, 965 pages. $6.00

THE NEGRO IN AMERICAN LIFE

by JEROME DOWD

¶ A scholarly study of the history, potentialities and probable future of the black race. $5.00

FACING EUROPE

by FREDERICK BAUSMAN

¶ A vigorous answer to the rising European envy and hatred of the U.S., to the organized propaganda of contumely, veiled threats and lamentations which hopes to force abrogation of the debts. Judge Bausman, formerly of the Supreme Court of Washington State, an American of old stock, analyzes our perilous diplomatic isolation. Most particularly he shows how England, growing in wealth and tenacious of her long established preeminence, is aligning the powers against us. $3.00

TRAILS OF THE TROUBADOURS

by RAIMON DE LOI

¶ Piquant historical information about kings, poets and adventurers, the romantic lovers of the middle ages, and their ladies fair and frail. Illus. $3.00

IN BARBARY

by E. ALEXANDER POWELL

¶ A glorious story of Northern Africa, of fighting men and dancing girls, of desert, palace and bazaar. The final book to record Col. Powell's long African exploration, following THE MAP THAT IS HALF UNROLLED and BEYOND THE UTMOST PURPLE RIM. Illus. $4.00

EAST OF SIAM

by HARRY A. FRANCK

¶ A colorful and adventurous story of wanderings in the Purple East, through the teeming cities, jungles and forgotten empires of French Indo-China. Fully Illus. $3.50

THE WORSHIP OF NATURE

By James George Frazer. The Macmillan Company
$4 8½ x 5¾; 672 pp. New York

The subjects treated are the worship of the sky, the earth and the sun. In a later volume the discussion of sun worship will be continued, and there will be chapters on the worship of other natural objects, animate and inanimate. The book contains the Gifford lectures delivered by the author in 1924 and 1925, but with much additional matter. It sadly lacks an index.

PHYSICO-CHEMICAL EVOLUTION.

By Ch. Eug. Guye. E. P. Dutton & Company
$2.40 7¾ x 5; 172 pp. New York

An attempt to apply the mathematical doctrine of probability to physical, chemical and biological phenomena. The book is full of original and often very striking speculations, but will be difficult to most laymen. The author is professor of physics at the University of Geneva. The translation is by J. R. Clarke, of the University of Sheffield.

RELIGION

Edited by Peter Guilday. P. J. Kenedy & Sons
$2.75 8 x 5¼; 430 pp. New York

Fourteen Catholic historians, from Eusebius in the Fourth Century to Ludwig von Pastor, who is still living, are discussed here by as many authorities. The essays were presented at the last annual convention of the American Catholic Historical Association. In his foreword the editor points out that not "a single American name is among those who have forwarded the general study of Catholic Church history."

THE NEGLECTED BOOK.

By M. M. Mangasarian. The Truth Seeker Company
$2.50 8 x 5; 270 pp. New York

This is a book for infants and other such budding atheists. The author labels as nonsense everything in the Bible, including the Sermon on the Mount. He sees no beauty whatever in it.

THE BEAUTIFUL CHILDHOOD.

By E. Frances Boulting. Harcourt, Brace & Company
$2. 8¼ x 5¼; 238 pp. New York

A modernized account of the childhood of Jesus, written especially for children. The tale is told reverently, and there is nothing in the text that would jar even the most rabid Bryanite. The illustrations, however, may bring a little uneasiness to Georgia Baptists and Cumberland Presbyterians, for in some of them Mary seems to be taken directly from the advertising pages of Vogue.

THIS BELIEVING WORLD.

By Lewis Browne. The Macmillan Company
$3.50 8¾ x 5½; 347 pp. New York

In the words of the subtitle, "A simple account of the great religions of mankind." That immense field is covered with sound knowledge and sure skill: the book is interesting, accurate and valuable. The author is (or has been) a Jewish rabbi, but there is no sign of it in his writing.

MOHAMMED.

By R. F. Dibble. The Viking Press
$3 8¾ x 5½; 257 pp. New York

The first realistic history of Mohammed in English. Mr. Dibble's account of him is very instructive and amusing, and in it there are many illuminating sidelights upon the ideas and careers of other prophets.

MAN CREATED DURING DESCENT.

By Morris Morris. Marshall Brothers
3/6 7¼ x 4½; 111 pp. London

The author, who is a geologist turned clergyman, argues that the sharp break separating Neolithic Man from Modern Man is proof that the evolutionary process, at that point, was helped by special creation. He is otherwise a thoroughgoing evolutionist, and shows an extensive acquaintance with paleontological and archeological evidences. His little book offers small comfort to Fundamentalists, but the Modernists who try to reconcile faith and science will find it very valuable.

THE STORY OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

By Cuthbert Wright. Albert & Charles Boni
$2.50 7¾ x 5¼; 315 pp. New York

This book is sketchy and of little solid value, but readers unfamiliar with the history of the Catholic Church will probably find it interesting. The author discusses the errors and corruptions of the Church very realistically, but closes with an eloquent plea for Christianity.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT.

By P. J. Noel Baker. Harcourt, Brace & Company
$4 9 x 5¾; 352 pp. New York

Professor Baker is an optimist, and believes that, with England taking the lead, disarmament in fact as well as in theory is a possibility, but his discussion

The Outstanding Biography of the Year

George Washington

The Human Being & the Hero

1732 1762

BY RUPERT HUGHES

Nathaniel Wright Stephenson in the New York World:

"A serene, well-balanced but keenly critical study. It is a great relief to find an able, popular author coming back to the old, well-bred tradition that a writer should talk to his reader across the printed page in the same tentative, give-and-take spirit in which a gentleman would talk to another across a dinner table. . . . This first volume has set a high mark for the second."

Claude G. Bowers in The Nation:

"Mr. Hughes has taken the youthful Washington, a fading myth, and made him a red-blooded, lusty, gusty human being for the first time. A splendid stirring story."

Editorial in the Cleveland Plain Dealer:

"Places George Washington really on a higher and more imposing pedestal than that which has been built by generations of flatterers and endless volumes of fulsome and uncritical praise."

197 pages, profusely illustrated. Second printing. $4.00 makes the problem out to be so complex and shows so many difficulties in the way that few readers will follow him. There is very little rhetoric in his book. It is the most sober and intelligent treatise on the subject yet published.

THE HOME TOWN MIND.

By Duncan Aikman. Minton, Balch & Company
$2.50 8 x 5 1/4; 295 pp. New York

Many of the essays in this book have appeared in THE AMERICAN MERCURY. Their general subject is the psychology of the latter-day American. There is a great deal of shrewd observation in them.

EDUCATION AND THE GOOD LIFE.

By Bertrand Russell. Boni & Liveright
$2.50 8 3/8 x 5 3/8; 319 pp. New York

Mr. Russell is a great believer in education and is extremely optimistic about its possibilities. "If existing knowledge were used," he says, "and tested methods applied, we could, in a generation, produce a population almost wholly free from disease, malevolence, and stupidity." He adds somewhat cautiously, "I do not mean these statements to be taken in an absolute sense."

PLATO'S AMERICAN REPUBLIC.

By Douglas Woodruff. E. P. Dutton & Company
$1 6 3/4 x 4 1/4; 116 pp. New York

As the title implies, this book is written in the form of a Platonic dialogue. It is full of shrewd and merciless comment on this land of the free, the brave and the prosperous, but there is very little of the usual blather in it about our lack of idealism and our love of the dollar. The author actually has something to say, and he can say it concisely and sharply. The only thing that will save him from a public hanging at the hands of the American Legion and the K. K. K. is that they will think he is joking.

PARTY CAMPAIGN FUNDS.

By James K. Pollock, Jr. Alfred A. Knopf
$3 8 1/8 x 5 3/8; 296 pp. New York

The first serious study of campaign financing ever attempted. The author encountered immense difficulty in amassing his materials, but surmounted most of them very effectively. He concludes that "the elimination from the [corrupt practices] laws of a large number of don'ts and the insertion of an effective publicity do will contribute more toward raising the level of political practices than all the penal legislation on the books."

ENGLAND.

By W. R. Inge.

Charles Scribner's Sons

8 7/8 x 5 5/8; 302 pp.

New York

In this volume the Gloomy Dean is by no means as gloomy as some of the reviews have made him out. He sees clearly that England is in a parlous state, and he sets forth the causes thereof very frankly, but he is not convinced that all is lost. The volume is one of the series called "The Modern World," edited by H. A. L. Fisher.

HISTORY

CINCINNATI'S COLORED CITIZENS.

By Wendell P. Dabney. The Dabney Publishing Company

$3.25

9 x 5 1/4; 440 pp.

Cincinnati

An anecdotal and often extremely amusing history of the colored folk of Cincinnati, with scores of biographical sketches and illustrations. The author, who is editor of the Cincinnati Union, has a lively style, and the usual dullness of a local history is not in his book.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE. A History.

By Thomas Jefferson Wertenbaker. Charles Scribner's Sons

New York

This is a safe and sound survey of the history of this country, and no county school superintendent, however solicitous for the moral welfare and civic integrity of his charges, need have any fears about using it as a text-book. The author, who is Edwards professor of American history at Princeton, handles the Great War in a sensible American Legion manner.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROBLEMS UNDER LINCOLN.

By James G. Randall.

D. Appleton & Company

8 1/2 x 5 1/2; 580 pp.

New York

Strangely enough, this is the first formal work upon its subject. It sets forth the results of a long and patient inquiry, and is well ordered and of great value to the constitutional student. There is an excellent annotated bibliography.

WARFARE. A Study of Military Methods from the Earliest Times.

By Oliver L. Spaulding, Hoffman Nickerson and John W. Wright.

Harcourt, Brace & Company

8 1/2 x 5 1/2; 601 pp.

New York

This is a fascinating and extremely valuable work. It carries the history of military strategy and tactics from the dawn of history down to the Frederician era, and is well designed and clearly written. Col. Spauld-

1468 NEW 1926 OXFORD BOOKS

Most extremely useful things are uninteresting. Not so this book on English Usage. Like its author, it has a sense of humor; its little paragraphs sparkle like the sunlight on the sea. Its pages compose a collection of familiar essays, discriminating and often provocative on the genius of the English language. Price $3.00.

New Verse. By Robert Bridges.

A collection of verse written in 1921 by Robert Bridges, Poet Laureate of England, with the other poems of that year and a few earlier pieces. A delightful volume of verse, beautifully printed, and bound in imitation vellum. Price $2.00.

The Prelude, or Growth of a Poet's Mind. By William Wordsworth. Edited from the Manuscripts, with Introduction, Textual and Critical Notes by Ernest de Selincourt.

The Prelude, an autobiographical poem, is the essential living document for the interpretation of Wordsworth's life and poetry. The original version of 1805, compared here for the first time with the edition published in 1850, reveals what is most significant in the poet's development. Price $8.50.

The United States and France. Some Opinions on International Gratitude, selected with a Foreword by James Brown Scott.

In the light of recent interesting developments in the relations of America and France, the appearance of Dr. Scott's book is particularly timely. What are and have been our true relations with the sister republic, and what, sanely and historically considered, is our debt to France, and her debt to us? Dr. Scott, Secretary of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, offers here an authoritative summary which should profoundly affect American public opinion. Price $2.75.

Everybody's Guide to Radio Music. By Percy A. Scholes.

A book for the increasingly large new musical public, giving a brief but complete and simple explanation of the forms which music takes, the instruments of the orchestra, and the history of the art of music. Price $2.00.

Letters from William Blake to Thomas Butts, 1800-1803. (Limited Edition.)

Reproductions of ten letters written by Blake, "with a charm and freedom he seldom allowed himself," to Butts. The volume includes a receipted bill in Blake's autograph. Price $8.50.

The Social and Economic History of the Roman Empire. By M. Rostovtzeff.

M. Rostovtzeff is a brilliant scholar, who combines daring with erudition. In this first serious attempt to connect the social and economic evolution of the Roman Empire with its constitutional and administrative development, the author makes successful use of this combination of talents. Price $15.00.

The Prophetic Writings of William Blake. Edited with a General Introduction, Glossarial Index of Symbols, Commentary and Appendices, by D. J. Sloss and J. P. R. Wallis. Oxford English Texts.

This edition gives an exact text of those of William Blake's Prophetic Writings which, from their generally non-lyrical form, could not be included in the 1905 edition of the poems. The broad conclusions concerning Blake's doctrines and opinions on metaphysics, ethics, and art, as revealed in these writings, are brought out in the introduction. Two volumes. Price, cloth, $14.00. India paper edition, two volumes in one, price $21.00.

Preaching in Theory and Practice. By the Rev. Samuel McComb, D.D. With an Introduction by the Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick, D.D.

Stimulating lectures which encourage preaching as a fine art, an indispensable social function and a sacred entrustment of influence. A book of popular demand to answer the needs of the modern world. Price $2.00.

The Commandments of Men. By W. H. Moore.

A number of essays on the relations of the individual, the churches and the state. "Men have already lost a large measure of control over their own lives, and must now face an organized effort to take away a considerable part of the freedom that remains." Price $1.75.

Psycho-Analysis for Normal People. By Geraldine Coster.

This is a short, practical handbook which sets forth in the simplest possible way the main principles of analytical psychology in its application to the ordinary, normal person. It will be particularly useful to the nurse and teacher, as well as the general reader. Price $1.25.

About Shakespeare and His Plays. By G. F. Bradby.

All that is known of the man Shakespeare, and the main problems raised by his plays, are outlined in the clearest way in this small, compact volume. Price $1.20.

LOYALISM IN VIRGINIA.

By Isaac Samuel Harrell. The Duke University Press
$2.50 8 x 5 1/4; 203 pp. Durham, N. C.

A valuable study of the Revolutionary politics and economics of Virginia. Mr. Harrell, who is assistant professor of history in New York University, points out that the staunchest supporters of the Revolution in the State were the planters and not the merchants, as was the case in New England. There is an excellent bibliography.

THE HISTORY OF SPIRITUALISM.

By Arthur Conan Doyle. The George H. Doran Company
$7.50 8 1/2 x 5 3/4; 2 vols., 329+338 pp. New York

A dreadful double dose of humorless bilge. Sir Arthur takes the tricks of the Fox sisters, Home, Slade, Eusapia Palladino and other such swindlers quite seriously, and adds an almost incredible chapter on the geography and social organization of Heaven. There are portraits of mediums and of their more eminent dupes.

ANTHOLOGIES

AMERIKANISCHE PROSA VOM BÜRGERKRIEG
BIS AUF DIE GEGENWART (1863-1922).

By Walther Fischer. B. G. Teubner
M.8 9 1/4 x 5 3/4; 256 pp. Leipzig

This is a volume of selections from recent American prose for the use of German students. The authors represented run from Lowell and Abraham Lincoln to Hergesheimer and Sinclair Lewis. The selections are intelligently made, and there is an excellent critical introduction by the editor, who also provides many useful notes. He was recently called to the University of Giessen from Dresden, where he had been professor of English philology in the Technical High-School.

CANADIAN POETS.

Edited by John W. Garvin.

McClelland & Stewart, Limited
9 1/2 x 6; 536 pp. Toronto

In this book the editor attempts a representative selection of the best poetry written in Canada from the time of the Confederation down to the present. Seventy-five poets are quoted. Preceding each group of poems there is a portrait, a brief biographical note and a short critical comment. All the Canadian Parnassians seem to run to the orthodox forms, and their products leave one with a feeling of staleness.

FOLK BELIEFS of the SOUTHERN NEGRO

By NEWBELL NILES PUCKETT

FOLK BACKGROUND STUDIES

An intensely human book of folk-lore and superstition, hoodoo and conjure, magic and religion, signs and wonders. Whenever possible the tangled origins of these strange beliefs are indicated. "Mutilated and half-forgotten, smeared with the veneer of culture, and hammered together with items of 'book-larnin,' health propaganda, Scripture, and what not, this miscellany nevertheless shows the Negro to be, at least in part, the custodian of former beliefs of the white." $5.00

ESSAYS

LAST ESSAYS.

By Joseph Conrad. Doubleday, Page & Company
\$2 7 $\frac{3}{8}$ x 4 $\frac{7}{8}$; 171 pp. Garden City, L. I.

The principal contents of this volume are Conrad's Congo diary, his well-known essays on John Galsworthy and Stephen Crane, and a number of papers on the sea. His last essay, "Legends," left incomplete at his death, is printed as it was found on his desk.

FALLODEN PAPERS.

By Viscount Grey of Falloden. The Houghton Mifflin Company
\$2.50 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$; 169 pp. Boston

The literary recreations of a retired politician. There are the usual essays on reading, on the pleasures of outdoors, and on Wordsworth's "Prelude." Lord Grey hasn't much to say, but he says that little gracefully.

REPRINTS

SIX MASTERPIECES OF ÉMILE ZOLA.

THE WORKS OF STEPHEN CRANE.

Edited by Wilson Follett.

Alfred A. Knopf

$7.50 a volume 7½ x 5¼; 12 volumes New York

This, the first collected edition of Crane's works, is admirably turned out. The volumes were designed by Elmer Adler and set up, printed and bound by the Plimpton Press. The binding is of tan linen, with black backs and labels. The contents of the volumes so far issued are as follows: I. "The Red Badge of Courage" and "The Veteran"; II. "Tales of Two Wars"; III. "The Monster" and "The Third Violet"; IV. "Active Service"; V. "Whilomville Stories"; VI. "The Black Riders," "War is Kind" and "Intrigue"; VII. and VIII. "The O'Ruddy"; IX. "Wounds in the Rain." There are prefaces to the various volumes by Joseph Hergesheimer, Willa Cather, William Lyon Phelps, Carl Van Doren, the late Amy Lowell, Thomas Beer, Robert H. Davis and the editor.

THE NEWGATE CALENDAR.

Introduction by Henry Savage. Edwin Valentine Mitchell

$3.50 9¼ x 6¼; 265 pp. Hartford, Conn.

This is an abridgment of Knapp and Baldwin's well-known "Newgate Calendar," which was lately republished in full. The selections are well made, and the volume, like its progenitor, is immensely diverting. There are many illustrations from old prints.

THE TRAVELS OF MARCO POLO.

Edited by Manuel Komroff.

Boni & Liveright

$3.50 8¾ x 5¾; 369 pp. New York

An excellent edition of a work that will never grow old. The translation is based upon Marsden's version of 1818, but the errors in the latter have been corrected by reference to the Yule-Cordier version. Mr. Komroff has wisely omitted the formidable notes which burden the Yule-Cordier.

TRAVEL

THE SURGEON'S LOG.

By L. Johnston Abraham.

E. P. Dutton & Company

$5 8½ x 5½; 361 pp. New York

A very amusing and well written book of travel impressions of the Far East. The author went out to have a good time, and not to "broaden himself," and his narrative is therefore very racy. There are many reproductions of photographs.

Interesting Books of First Importance!

A MILLION AND ONE NIGHTS

The History of the Motion Picture
by Terry Ramsaye

THE first complete chronicle of The Celluloid Age—a colorful, authentic, absorbingly interesting record teeming with Americana, the folkways, the adventures, intrigues, fables, dreams and follies of our own Arabian Nights... Thomas A. Edison, who read the entire book in manuscript, calls it "a monumental work". Alexander Black, eminent novelist, pronounces it "unfailingly entertaining, jolly and judicious". You will find a gay and romantic story, un-alloyed by press-agentry, filled with melodrama and humor, sinister struggle and flamboyant slapstick, experiments and escapades.

Two large volumes boxed 6 1/4 x 9 3/8, 1000 pages, 100 full page halftone illustrations; superbly designed and bound. $10

TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE IN MANY LANDS.

By Cecil Gosling. E. P. Dutton & Company
$3.50 9 x 5 3/4; 403 pp. New York

This is exactly what a travel book should be. Mr. Gosling, who has spent the greater part of his life in traveling over practically the entire globe, not only has a keen eye for the picturesque, but also a thorough understanding of the historical backgrounds of the lands he visited. His chapters on the Spanish bull-fights of thirty years ago are exceptionally well done.

THE FINE ARTS

THE PHYSICAL BASIS OF PIANO TOUCH AND TONE.

By Otto Ortmann. E. P. Dutton & Company
$5 8 5/8 x 5 1/2; 189 pp. New York

This book describes the first scientific inquiry ever made into the nature and production of the sounds made by a piano. Mr. Ortmann finds that they may be analyzed into relatively simple components, and that even the most delicate and beautiful tone is made up of these elements. His study is original and very valuable. There are numerous diagrams and other illustrations, and a bibliography.

IN QUEST OF THE PERFECT BOOK.

By William Dana Orcutt. Little, Brown & Company
$5 9 x 5 3/4; 316 pp. Boston

Mr. Orcutt is well known for his connection with the University and Plimpton Presses. Here, in a charming volume, lavishly illustrated, he tells some of his adventures as a maker of fine books, beginning with his acquaintance with Dr. Guido Biagi, of the Laurenziana Library at Florence. The memory of Biagi, in fact, dominates his narrative, though there are entertaining reminiscences of other friends, including especially Charles Eliot Norton.

By Alexander Moray. Harcourt, Brace and Company
 $2 7¾ x 5 ¼; 288 pp. New York

Janet is born with an angelic kindness toward all mankind. Her father and husband are beasts, but she loves them both to the end. Her death produces a great change in the latter—he becomes very sweet and charming.

HERE COME SWORDS.

By Coutts Brisbane. Dodd, Mead & Company
 $2 7½ x 5 ¼; 302 pp. New York

This is the tale of the military and more personal adventures of a gay rascal of medieval Italy. With a change of names the story might just as well have been placed in Arkansas or Vermont.

MISCELLANEOUS

SKAZKI. Tales and Legends of Old Russia.

Translated by Ida Zeitlin.

The George H. Doran Company
 $5 9¾ x 6 ½; 332 pp. New York

The Russian skazka corresponds to the fairy tale of Western Europe, but is full of Oriental color. The first collection of skazki was made by A. N. Afanasiev in 1855. Miss Zeitlin presents thirteen stories, some of them from Afanasiev and the rest from Pushkin and Zhukovsky. They are sumptuously illustrated with drawings by Theodore Nadejen, some in black and white, some in gold and black, and some in full color.

THE MODERN LIBRARY gives book lovers the outstanding books of all countries—in English—handsomely printed and bound—sized to fit the pocket—at a low price!

A NEW MODERN LIBRARY title is added on the first of each month. Newest additions:

Max Beerholm's "Zuleika Dobson," Oscar Wilde's "De Profundis," Herman Melville's "Moby Dick," Remy de Gourmont's "A Night in the Luxembourg," Thomas Hardy's "The Return of the Native."

H. WOLFF now manufactures all Modern Library titles. This is just one more instance of publishers' confidence in "the largest capacity book plant in the metropolitan area."

COLLECTED PARODIES.

By Louis Untermeyer. Harcourt, Brace & Company
$2.75 8¼ x 5½; 324 pp. New York

Few parodists are more ingenious than Mr. Untermeyer, and none is more devastating. Here are parodies by the score, in prose and verse, and scarcely one of them fails to be a true hit.

PHILOSOPHY FOR PLAIN PEOPLE.

By Maurice M. Kaunitz. The Adelphi Company
$3 8 x 5½; 394 pp. New York

Mr. Kaunitz apparently has learned most of his philosophy from second-hand sources. On page 381, in fact, he confesses that Frank Thilly's "History of Philosophy" has served as a guide for him. In his discussion of Nietzsche's best thoughts, such as his ideas of slave morality, he says that "it is highly probable that our philosopher was not quite sane when he expressed such views." And on page 386 he actually quotes, and with great respect, from Elbert Hubbard! The last nine pages are a hymn to Ethical Culture, wherein "Reason is enthroned highest."

TRANSITION. Essays on Contemporary Literature.

By Edwin Muir. The Viking Press
$2 7¼ x 4¾; 218 pp. New York

These essays have a great solemnity, and reading them thus does not qualify as a dissipation, but there is much sound and excellent criticism in them. The authors discussed are James Joyce, D. H. Lawrence, Virginia Woolf, Stephen Hudson, Lytton Strachey, T. S. Eliot, Edith Sitwell and Robert Graves.

READINGS IN CIVIC SOCIOLOGY.

By Edward Alsworth Ross and Mary Edna McCaull.
The World Book Company
7¾ x 5; 398 pp. Chicago

As such books go, this is an excellent one. The selections are brief but highly instructive, and the scientific and political authorities quoted are among the leaders in their various fields. The high-school authorities, however, in whose hands will lie the choice of this book as a text for their classes, will be a bit disturbed by some of the readings. There are, for example, some quotations from Professor Zechariah Chafee's "Freedom of Speech" which would cause a revolution if read at a national convention of the American Legion.

THE GYPSY PATTERN.

Edited by Joseph Ellner. Bernard G. Richards Co., Inc.
$2 7½ x 5; 302 pp. New York

A collection of twelve tales of gypsy life in Europe and America. Among the authors represented are Maxim Gorki, Cervantes, Jean Richepan, William Sharp and Louise Rice. The introduction by the editor is short but useful. There is a brief glossary of gypsy words.

MISSISSIPPI STEAMBOATIN'

by Herbert and Edward Quick

*It was Herbert Quick's creative genius that gave us "Vandemark's Folly" and
"The Hawkeye."*

Authentic romance and vivid history much like Parkman's "Oregon Trail"—the story of the steamboat and the picturesque inland sailors who helped move the nation westward. It traces the steamboat's development from the first crude steamer in the Mississippi Valley to our modern steel vessels.

Gamblers, swearing mates and racing captains, fighters all, taking desperate chances on the falls of the Ohio, rollicking in New Orleans or up the Missouri or helping Grant at Vicksburg, make this a vivid tale of action and color—an ideal gift for a man.

THE AMERICAN MERCURY

“Yours is the Earth and Everything that’s in it”

IN his immortal poem, IF, Rudyard Kipling described his own works better than any one else ever has. . . the Earth and everything that's in it.

He was not talking about himself, nor even about books, yet the phrase is a perfect description. For in the novels, poems, tales and essays of the Universal writer the whole vivid panorama of Life is pictured with the consummate artistry of a genius.

There is someone you wish to remember this Christmas, with a gift that means something more than money-value. There is someone to whom you would like to give the Earth, if you could. Here is your opportunity.

Here are weeks, yes, months of travel, travel in the strangest of lands, travel spiced with romance, colored by high adventure. Here is humor, pathos, love and hate and every human emotion pictured so clearly that the reader is never conscious of his own surroundings, but is swept away in a turmoil of action. Here is the spray of the sea; the grandeur of mountain peaks and storm-torn skies; the hum and bustle of Oriental bazaars; the stillness of jungle nights. Here are the hearts of British Tommies—serving their King in a foreign land. Here is the answer to that age-old riddle—the eyes of a native maid.

No other gift that money can buy will embrace all the advantages of a set of Rudyard Kipling. It will remain on your book shelves through the years, always available, always new, a source of infinite pleasure, evidence of the taste of the giver and his regard for the recipient.

THE MANDALAY KIPLING

Today's outstanding book bargain. The Mandalay Edition of the work of Rudyard Kipling is one of the most spectacular book bargains of modern times. When it is considered that here is amusement and diversion for every mood, created by one of the greatest masters of English prose and verse, it also becomes a great entertainment bargain as well.

Printed from large, easily-read type of beautiful design, on high grade book paper. Essays, poems and stories; Kipling's full 26 volumes, may now be had (bound in the most up-to-date way—two-in-one) in a beautiful maroon binding for only $29.50.

The finest set at a popular price ever published!

UNTIL NEXT SEPTEMBER TO PAY

Although The Mandalay Kipling is the utmost in quality, a gift fit for a King, it is within the easy reach of everyone. The easy terms give you immediate possession and give you until next September, nine full months, to pay.

If you desire, enclose name and address of friend to whom

TODAY ?

DIVORCE

FEMINISM

LOVE AS AN ART

THE MATING INSTINCT

PROBLEM

THE PSYCHOLOGY

MARRIAGE IN

MARRIAGE IN THE FUTURE

One of the most interesting books of the decade. It discusses the fundamental principles underlying marriage and sex relations in modern society. A book full of explosive ideas. Among the contributors are Jung, the psychoanalyst, Keyserling (with two articles), Havelock Ellis, Jacob Wassermann, Beatrice M. Hinkle, Rabindranath Tagore, Thomas Mann, and Leo Frobenius.

BORAH OF IDAHO

BY RAY T. TUCKER

WILLIAM EDGAR BORAH's first noteworthy appearance on the American scene, as brilliant prosecutor of three Western mining leaders who had found dynamite more effective than collective bargaining, was contemporaneous with the homicidal outbreak of Harry Thaw and the evolution of a type of newspaper which seized upon both men as equally good copy. Borah's forensic feats in that remote Idaho court-room were pictured in great and colorful detail by a swarm of metropolitan reporters, and so his star was high in the firmament when he hung his black wide-awake hat on a Senate office peg on March 4, 1907, combed back his shaggy brown mane, and looked around for new worlds to astound, if not to conquer.

His part in prosecuting Big Bill Haywood, Moyer and Pettibone had made a deep impression upon the Old Guard leaders of the Senate. They rubbed their hands at the accession of this solid and serious Republican from the Mormon State of Idaho, for their ranks were in sore need of recruits in those muck-raking, panicky days of 1907. The Old Guard envisaged Borah as a stalwart reinforcement in the holy work of resisting the new movement for reform, and stifling the awakening class-consciousness of the American working man. He was immediately made chairman of the Committee on Labor and Education, an unheard-of trust for a first-termer, for any attempt to translate the rising clamor of the downtrodden into legislative reality would have to have its beginnings in that committee. To certain cynical colleagues who expressed alarm at the bestowal of such a key post on an untried man, Senator Aldrich, the Republican boss, replied with a cloak-room wink: "It's all right. I've looked him up. He's an anti-labor man and a corporation attorney."

But Aldrich, for once, was wrong. He was the first of the long line of Senators to grapple unsuccessfully with the enigma of Borah. For almost immediately the newcomer took to disconcerting, and, in the view of the Old Guard, grossly immoral practises. Far from guarding valiantly the Senate citadel of capitalism, he proceeded, with full steam, to make a wreck of it. Soon his committee was reporting out, and getting passed, the most radical proposals an astonished and horrified Senate had ever been asked to consider on the labor question. There were bills establishing the eight-hour day on government contracts, bills for the creation of a new and highly dubious Department of Labor, and subversive resolutions for the investigation of the twelve-hour day and the seven-day week in the sacrosanct iron and steel industries. Borah and labor became articulate together, and began to sing the same appalling tune. It was good business for a young Senator trying to get upon the first pages, but in Aldrich's view it was sheer spoils and treason. His protégé was striking mighty blows at everything the Aldrichs held to be sacred. No more disastrous treachery had ever been heard of on Capitol Hill.

From that painful perfidy dates the conviction of all the Republican stalwarts that Borah is an untrustworthy fellow. His doings since then, stretching over a score of years, have only confirmed this judgment. To the Old Guard of to-day, as to that of 1907, he is a puzzle and a plague. As the years have rolled on, indeed, he has puzzled the safe and sane men more and more, for sometimes he has been violently against them and at other times he has been amazingly with them. There are many facets, it appears, to his character. At times he has stood forth as a soaring Liberal; at times he has been more conservative than Mr. Coolidge. The public, long since despairing of understanding him, or reconciling the conflicting manifestations of his personality, now views him, it would seem, as sui generis—a courageous but incomprehensible figure, one who voices his convictions unexpectedly and boldly, no matter how adversely they may affect his party standing or his political security.

His enemies call him an obstructionist, a dreamer, a prima donna, and say he prefers the fame which flows from strutting the political peaks in solitary grandeur and obstinacy to solid accomplishments shared with his peers. When his Senate colleagues discuss him among themselves, they use very plain English: he is a faker, a trimmer, a false alarm. His admirers are just as intemperate; to them he is the foremost exponent of practical idealism in American public life today and the perennially prospective messiah of a third party dedicated to righteousness. Meanwhile, Mr. Borah himself appears to know precisely what he believes, and why. His one and constant boast is that he is an old-fashioned American who patterns his beliefs and conduct after the Constitution and the—to him—obvious purposes of the Founding Fathers. He can justify—to himself at least—every act of his mystifying career by constitutional precedents. Before the heroes who founded this best of all possible governments his abasement is absolute.

But necessity often compels him to resort to curious personal interpretations and a species of revelation to satisfy this passion for following in the Fathers' footsteps. As the social and political order has grown more complex his divinations have had to become more numerous and arduous, and to many it now seems that his divining-rod has been overworked and warped. But to all entreaties that he discard it, or lay it up for repairs, he remains deaf, for he believes that he cannot go wrong if he clings to the Constitution, or to his understanding of it. With the thunderous assertion that "the Fathers understood the science of government as no other single group of men ever understood it," he annihilates his opponents, and he will continue to do so as long as his colleagues in the Senate let pass without challenge his highly dubious citations of precedent, and his clairvoyant glimpses into the minds of Washington, Hamilton and Jefferson.

II

To those who still look upon him as a Liberal it may come as a surprise that in his calendar of saints he places Hamilton above the "masterful" Washington and "wide-ranging" Jefferson. He concedes, of course, the contributions of Washington and Jefferson to the young Republic, but we have his word for it that "in his complete mastery of the problems of that extraordinary era Alexander Hamilton stood alone." With all the Hamiltonian doctrines, to be sure, Mr. Borah does not agree—he agrees with no man, living or dead—but his general veneration of the West Indian orphan who would have transformed the new Republic into a pseudo-monarchy perhaps illumines some of the paradoxes and idiosyncrasies of his own career.

It is not difficult to discover the bond which attaches him to Hamilton. Hamilton was a stark egoist, brooking neither opposition nor peer; he was an indomitable fighter, though he did not always fight fair; his ambitions were boundless, though never satisfied. For the mediocrity of his associates and the judgments of the common people he had naught but disdain. Withal, he was a lonely, wistful figure, bereft in defeat or victory of the consolations and heart-warmings which are the lot of the public man who races with the crowd. Seen in this light Borah's eulogy of Hamilton assumes the aspect of a jeremiad against the neglect which a careless republic bestows upon its great men—those of the Twentieth as well as those of the Eighteenth Century. Speaking on the lack of a statue to Hamilton in the nation's capital some years ago, Mr. Borah appeared as recorder and seer:

Strange irony in the reward a republic gives her creators! What delays the hour when this government shall do honor to itself by honoring Hamilton? Is it because he never flattered nor turned aside from the clear vision of his intellect to court popular applause; that there is not to be found in all his writings or speeches a line or phrase to indicate he ever sought to arouse the passions, or enlist the prejudices, or win by sinister means the applause of the multitude? Out of the integrity of his intellect and the high purpose of his soul he led them. Is it because by searching the pages of bitter political controversy, and reviving and resuscitating the stale slander of another century, men are led to say that, while manifestly great, he was not divine? We rear monuments to men; not deities. . . . What a dismal place yonder Hall of Fame would be if great men had to be as perfect as the rules and demands of small men would make them!

What Mr. Borah means, obviously, and what he resents, is that the penalty of independence—such as Hamilton's and his own—is no statue. But there are cynics in the Senate who answer that the mere fact of remaining callous to obligations which other men acknowledge is no guarantee of a man's worth.

But regardless of the nature and results of this exemption from the "rules and demands of small men," Mr. Borah displayed it early. He had barely turned seventeen when he left a crowded household in Southern Illinois, where he was one of ten children, and set out to gain an education. This was an adventurous undertaking in 1882, though it did not seem so to his parents, who were the kind to encourage him. His father, though born in Kentucky, was of German descent, and the name was originally De Borah. The old man was an amateur Presbyterian preacher of power and originality. His mother was Irish, and it is from her, no doubt, that he derives his passionate sympathy for peoples oppressed. One need not look beyond his parentage to discover why Mr. Borah wavers between liberalism and conservatism, or why so many of his crusades for human freedom never get beyond a Senate oration. The hot Irish impulses and the phlegm of the Teuton stir within him conflicts which the world glimpses only as mysteries—as when he voices some novel proposal that gives the Administration conniption fits, and then lets it go at that.

Again, the spirit of persistence and concentration may have burned out, as it often will, in his student days, for he was a tireless scholar, an omnivorous reader. At preparatory school, and at Kansas State University, where he pursued the arts and the law, he was the same unsocial, unsmiling, preoccupied recluse that he is to-day. His only extra-curricular activity was debating, and then, as now, the unpopular side of a question held a terrible fascination for him. From the university he started for Seattle, but his funds gave out, so he got off the train at Boise. For all the industry with which the invading Mormons from Utah were taming Idaho, it was a frontier community when he arrived, and his immediate success at the criminal bar may have helped to delay the civilizing process. His eloquence captivated juries and clients, and eventually he entered the more lucrative practice of corporation law, where Aldrich found him. As secretary to Governor McConnell, whose daughter became Mrs. Borah, the young lawyer turned to politics. By 1901 he was sufficiently well known to present himself to the Legislature as a Republican candidate for the United States Senate. Characteristically enough, this was but five years after he had voted for Bryan on the gold issue. His excuse for this heresy was that it had not been personal; almost all Idaho was for Bryan, and therefore he sinned only out of local patriotism.

His instinctive dislike of organized politics was deepened by this first effort to get into office. He was not the organization's favorite—he never has been—and though he led on the first ballot, the bosses knifed him. Unlike the three other contestants, Borah did not smile and shake hands. Before the crowd attending the session had dispersed he delivered an address after the manner of Mark Antony over Caesar, in which he declared that "King Caucus must go." This speech was a treat for the intellectually starved Idahoans, who were then far off the travelled path of itinerant actors and John Robinson's circus, and it made Borah a popular figure among them. Six years later he repeated the same speech at every crossroads, and so wrested the Senatorship from the bosses.

Thus he came to the Senate as a rebel. He came, too, without having served an apprenticeship in less august offices, where-in he might have learned the value and subtlety of the coöperative method. Moreover, he began his career at a time when Idaho was hardly conscious of Statehood, and chiefly concerned with local problems, so he took his seat as his own master, both a help and a handicap. It was during this first term that he achieved whatever reputation he still has as a radical. He championed labor's demands, it appears, not out of active sympathy for labor's abstract ideals or immediate wants, but because the Constitution guarantees freedom. Though, with Roosevelt, he denounced the old "tooth and claw" system, he differed from Roosevelt on the cure for it, and the latter's idea of government with the Big Stick left him cold. He opposed the creation of that strong and omniscient Federal overseer which was then the reformer's remedy for all human ills. Monopoly, he maintained, could not be regulated; it must be destroyed. Here he was at one with Roosevelt, but it was about the last time he was at one with anybody on any subject.

For the easy-going Mr. Taft Mr. Borah has always exhibited an amused contempt. In his opinion Mr. Taft represents the old order, but with more of sentiment than of logic. The two were at odds all through the Taft Administration, and even more so after 1912. When Mr. Taft became head of the League to Enforce Peace, Mr. Borah grew almost savage in his contention that it would require an army of tremendous proportions—and of many American units—to make the League's decrees effective. But it was not long, characteristically, before he himself appeared with a plan for outlawing war which differed only in name from that proposed by the soft-hearted ex-President. As between enforcing peace and outlawing war, few neutral men could discern much difference in the number of battleships and battalions and boys that would be required. But Mr. Borah, with his gift of divination, apparently saw a difference.

In view of the irreconcilable differences between the two men, it is a ludicrous comment on the American political system, as well as upon the personalities involved, that the Taft backers intimated that they would like Borah as their Vice-Presidential candidate in 1912. Thus, perhaps, they indicated that they had not accepted at its face value the Senator's long fight on the Administration. But Borah could no more have gone on a ticket headed by Taft than on one led by Woodrow Wilson. Yet it might have gained him a more secure niche in "yonder Hall of Fame" had he acquiesced, for Washington is still unable to fathom his conduct at the ensuing Armageddon. He tramped along with the Roosevelt army to the very fringe of the skirmish line and then suddenly faltered. He handled the Roosevelt contests in the convention, and bitterly denounced the fraudulent manner in which Teddy's supporters were unseated. Yet in the same breath he announced that he could not join the third-party movement, and departed for Idaho to look after his own campaign. His presence there was needed, for both Republicans and Progressives were assailing him. The Progressives shouted the louder, feeling they had been the more betrayed, but the Republicans controlled the Legislature. But Borah somehow won, though, apparently recognizing some inconsistency in his position, he told the Legislature that "when I am no longer privileged to use my own judgment and opinion, I will quit the party, fumigate myself and return to the practice of law." He followed none of these courses; he remained in the party, and was reelected.

III

With the inauguration of President Wilson, still more difficult days were to come. More and more Mr. Borah was called upon to exercise his "judgment and opinion" on questions which subjected his constitutionalism to a severe strain. For individuals as for nations there were then no precedents—save those of human nature gone stark mad.

The sonorous radicalism preached by Dr. Wilson in the early days was soon supplanted by the violent illiberalism of a nation engaged in war. Out of the struggle was to emerge a crazy universe of hates and cruelties and distortions. Against this sinister background Borah cut a futile figure. Prejudice, expediency, whim—these seemed to motivate him at an hour when even his best would have been all too scant. His kinship with every other politician since Adam became quite clear. "While manifestly great, . . . not divine." Unlike Mr. La Follette he did not brave the hysteria, and the strange new policy of vesting all of a Mussolini's power in the President brought no effective protest from him. Ever since then he has been expounding the theory that a republic should be able to wage war without the use of the repressive measures required in a monarchy, but during the actual war years he was one of the Senatorial mob which dashed this way and that as Dr. Wilson wagged his finger.

All this, it may be assumed, was gall and wormwood to him, though he acquiesced, and he was not long in having his revenge. The President opened the way for it with his demand for the ratification of the Versailles Treaty and the adoption of the League Covenant. Here Mr. Borah suddenly found himself on hallowed soil once more, with the earth dripping with ooings from the pens and tongues of the Founding Fathers. There was the hallowed warning against entangling alliances, there was the sacred Monroe Doctrine, and there was Borah, the sounder of alarms. It is a strange irony that from such a theatre he should have emerged with an admittedly diminished reputation and a smaller popular following than he had when the show began. Stranger still it was that the man who so loudly denounced Dr. Wilson's world dream should so soon thereafter become the instrument whereby the United States was plunged into the international maelstrom. For a time, however, he was on top, and it is with this historic struggle that the public still chiefly associates his name. It gained him his reputation as an obstructionist, and he glories in it. Yet he was actually little more than a trooper in the conflict. It was the late Frank B. Brandegee, of Connecticut, who sponsored the idea of that round robin against the League which sounded the tocsin of aroused nationalism, and it was Brandegee who mapped the battle. Borah was a willing recruit, but Brandegee drilled him.

Borah marched in the advance, but Brandegee directed the strategy.

With victory in the League fight in the balance as the Republican National Convention of 1920 approached, Mr. Borah resorted to a dodge he had toyed with so gingerly in 1912. That is, he threatened to organize a third party if the Republicans did not adopt a plank pledging opposition to the League. But apparently his threats, by this time, had lost their terror for the bosses, for the platform gave him no comfort, and neither did the candidate. The platform was evasive on the League, and so was Mr. Harding. As in 1912, Mr. Borah soon took the path of least, or no, resistance, and was presently stumping the country against the League but for Harding. Thus he was in the victorious but motley crew which moved on Washington in March, 1921. But he spoiled the plan of the Ohio gang to make the inaugural the maddest, merriest carnival since Jackson's day. His resolution calling for bald and simple ceremonies was a tough blow to the pierrots and harlequins in the party, but the precedent has been since followed by the unmerry Mr. Coolidge.

This trimming away of the Hon. Ned McLean's gaudy decorations and dousing of the red light came near being Mr. Borah's last great triumph. He saw President Harding choose a Cabinet dominated by internationally-minded men—Mellon, Hughes and Hoover—and he saw Coolidge retain them. The Old Guard and the White House could hardly be blamed if they had come to the conclusion by this time that Mr. Borah's bark was worse than his bite. But there soon came additional evidence that he could and would play the political game in accord with the "rules and demands of small men." Though he had broadcast his intention of voting against Boise Penrose, the Old Guard chieftain, for chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, he lined up with the reactionaries when the test came, receiving in return a pledge of organized Republican opposition to the League. It may have been a good piece of political bargaining, but his support of the man who epitomized everything he himself professed to despise—privilege, machine politics and the public-be-damned philosophy—shattered the lingering faith of many idealists who still looked to him for leadership.

Mr. Borah's ideas on the League prevailed, but that was soon seen to be a hollow victory, largely because of the mental obfuscation which beset him during the Harding Administration. As if that Administration were not involving America in European affairs speedily enough through its advocacy of the World Court, Mr. Borah proposed a more direct route. He demanded that the United States call a conference for the reduction of naval armaments. Mr. Harding frowned upon it, and Henry Cabot Lodge called it "Borah's dream." For six years the resolution had been introduced in the House or Senate in one form or another, but this time, for some occult reason, it took, and the nations were duly invited to Borah's party. But he was left out. He became a mere onlooker, and not a happy one. He was disturbed by what he saw and heard. He saw that the super-government he had once striven to destroy was arising anew on a firmer foundation, for which he had laid the cornerstone. So he voted against the pact born of his resolution, ostensibly because it did not ban submarines. His protests came too late, and the treaty making the United States one of three armed policemen in several spheres of highly probable wars was ratified.

Mr. Borah soon tried again, this time with a proposal for an international conference to solve all the social, political and economic ills of the universe, but again he allowed the Administration to buffalo him. At a hint that overtures for such a conference had actually been made, he hastily withdrew his resolution, but meanwhile Mr. Hughes, then Secretary of State, had hopped a train for New Haven, and there made the reparations proposals which led to the European pilgrimage of Owen D. Young and Charles G. Dawes. Too late does Mr. Borah seem to have learned to regret these victimizations. The arms agreement and the Dawes plan, as events have shaped themselves, appear to have won us no friends abroad. Yet to Borah the isolationist, more than any one else, is due our "involvement."

IV

The feverish period of 1919-1923 was followed by one of comparative calm. In President Harding's grand crusade to bring the nation back to normalcy Mr. Borah was a factor, but only in a vocal way. Even before the guns of the war had ceased firing, he was demanding economy, and soon he developed a perfect mania for reducing expenditures. He led the fight against the Adjusted Compensation Act, making eloquent pleas for the soldiers but denouncing the bonus. He was one of three Senators to vote against higher pay for the underpaid postal clerks, but he made up for this by voting against the bill to increase the pay of Congressmen. But economy was a passion with Mr. Borah long before Mr. Coolidge gave up his $35-a-month flat to move to the Willard Hotel. The fact, indeed, may serve as well as anything else to explain a friendship which in all other respects passeth understanding.

From such mundane matters as finances and the tariff the nation was summoned to a consideration of more spectacular problems shortly after Mr. Coolidge entered the White House. Teapot Dome was gushing forth scandal. But during this oleaginous period Mr. Borah seemed fettered by his constitutional chains, and his great accents were not heard as they had been on lesser occasions. He was not precisely silent—tongue-tied would best describe him. But for this strange failure to condemn those responsible for the corruption of the time he more than made up when the tumult died out. If the Republican party did not reform, he then gave warning, the people would rise in revolt and crush it. So thoroughly did the party take this wisdom to heart that Mr. Coolidge wanted Mr. Borah as his running mate in 1924, and asked him, so the story goes, to "accept a place on the ticket." "Which place?" rejoined Mr. Borah. It was a rare spark of humor in a grim man—so rare that it seems a shame Mr. Coolidge did not enjoy it. Mr. La Follette, then preparing for his death-bed bid for the Presidency, knew Mr. Borah too well to make the same request, but there were many romantic Liberals who expected the Idahoan to express his dissatisfaction with both the old parties by going with the insurgents. It was still another example of his talent for fooling folks who don't know him.

Unluckily for his reputation as a swash-buckler willing and eager to walk the plank as a third-party candidate, such demands have always come in years when he was up for reelection back in Idaho, and party fealty was essential to his success. Both in 1912 and in 1924 he had to cling to his post as petty officer aboard the Republican ship of state in order to remain on deck in any capacity. In consequence the piratical craft captained by Roosevelt and La Follette were not for him, no matter how longingly he may have gazed over the side at their black flags. In 1924 he had even more cogent reasons for standing by, for if he had gone with Fighting Bob he would have forfeited all claim to the chairmanship of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which had become vacant through the death of Senator Lodge.

If his prestige has suffered a great decline in recent years, it is probably due to three causes: his accession to the chairmanship of that committee, Mr. Coolidge's amiable neglect of the highly polite and constitutional antagonism that he exhibits toward the President's policies, and his amazing outbursts on the tender subject of Prohibition. Mr. Borah's academic opposition to certain of the Coolidge major policies does not worry Mr. Coolidge into making a scene, for Mr. Coolidge, in point of fact, has obtained almost everything he wanted from the committee over which Mr. Borah presides, and in the face of Mr. Borah's opposition. Thus the Idahoan has come to appear to political Washington as an ineffectual individual, a Prometheus bound to a rock, the rock being his chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee.

So he has not received his accustomed editorial fanfares of late; the old flourishes and ruffles have been strangely missing. Senators who have winced under his sharp tongue for years now take a fierce delight in nagging him. The Old Guard, still doing business, has led in this Borah baiting, with Senators Wadsworth of New York and Reed of Pennsylvania snapping the whips. Mr. Borah, however, is a fox of many artifices. While his critics were beating the bushes sheltering the rebel, the irregular, the irreconcilable, the prima donna, the Senate gadfly, the headline seeker, he was calmly heading for safer hiding places. It was not long, indeed, before his pursuers quite lost the scent—and Borah himself sniffed a new one. He discovered, one rainy Sunday, and related it to a startled world from a Presbyterian platform out in the Maryland Free State, that advocates of a modification of the Volstead Act were Nullificationists, and hence wicked and abandoned men. He immediately armed himself with his ancient weapons, the Constitution and historical precedent, and sallied forth to put them down. His armor seemed a bit rusty from long disuse, but with some polishing by Wayne B. Wheeler and Pussyfoot Johnson he soon rode forth a fine figure for the fray.

For an ardent States' rights man and champion of enslaved minorities overseas this new rôle seemed a trifle puzzling, but Mr. Borah, with all his old facility, lifted it above the vulgar and controversial plane by announcing that it was the Constitution, and not Prohibition, which was in danger. Another piece of news that he gave out was that the wets do not actually want light wines and beer, but plan an onslaught on the Constitution in order to bring back hard liquor. Though his position was comprehensible in its purely legalistic phases, there were few, even among the dries, who accepted his characterization of a referendum as Nullification. To all arguments that the Constitution, as amended during the turmoil of the war period, should now take cognizance of certain inescapable legal and physiological facts he has shown himself insensible, as he is to the contention that his beloved Founding Fathers would have been horrified by the embodiment of a sumptuary statute in the fundamental law. The practicality of his idealism, in fact, appears to have vanished completely from his latest venture, for in the face of the widespread corruption brought in by Prohibition, he maintains that nothing can be done until the Eighteenth Amendment has been formally repealed. Certainly he must know that only 13% of the population can keep the amendment in the Constitution, and thus hold the remaining 87% in perpetual bondage.

Mr. Borah's views on Prohibition will probably not affect the eventual settlement of this problem. The chief harm he will do will be to help defer the day when it can be disposed of without prejudice and without bigotry. Meanwhile, his speeches will fan the flame of fanatic passion, whether he means them to or not, and he himself will depart further and further from the record. For once he has attacked a subject, he has a tendency to neglect the facts, so lured is he by the magic of his own voice. It is a common failing, but in him it amounts to a disease. He is a great believer in oratory. Perhaps no other man in American public life to-day would so sincerely deplore the passing of the spoken word as a political and parliamentary weapon. Fortunately for him, he believes that this will come "only after selfishness and sensuality shall have imbruted or destroyed all the nobler faculties of the mind."

The conventional method of describing a Senate combat in which Mr. Borah takes a hand is to liken it to a bullfight. Borah, as the careless and imaginative pen records it, leans back easily in his seat, seemingly taking no interest in the subject under discussion. A faintly cynical smile occasionally appears on his lips. Finally he climbs to his feet, still smiling and leaning slightly forward. And then, urbanely, effortlessly, he becomes the picador, hurling jibing darts into the hide of the poor Senator who has aroused him. The victim, squirming, eventually flings back with an angry retort. Then Borah becomes the mighty matador. His dimpled chin juts out, the vertical lines in his forehead deepen into a frown, his eyes flash, he tosses his tremendous mane, and his words pour forth torrentially. They become rapier thrusts, seeking straight the heart of his antagonist, who presently falls. Borah then tosses aside his rapier lightly and resumes his seat. His colleagues stare in admiration; the galleries rock with applause.

What the correspondents fail to see is that Borah's rapier is sometimes tipped with poison. He often bests an opponent because the poor fellow is not sufficiently versed in history to controvert some of his most devastating and inaccurate assertions and allusions. A check-up reveals a Borah mistaken in his facts, but unless the error is detected while the combatants are on their feet, he gets the headlines, and his rival gets the ha-ha. During a debate, for example, on the French debt Senator Bruce of Maryland essayed to defend France by citing its generosity to the struggling colonies, while Mr. Borah contended that France had assisted the colonies merely to embarrass England. A sneer was Mr. Borah's retort to the Maryland Senator's assertion that France had given Benjamin Franklin 6,000,000 livres for which no repayment was asked. But as the debate continued, the plodding Bruce seemed to have the better of it in his authorities and facts. The great matador was about to be worsted. But no! Out flashed that famous rapier.

"Mr. President," appealed Borah, "I object to the Senator putting incorrect history into my speech!"

The galleries shook with applause and Senators chuckled at the discomfiture of the pedestrian Mr. Bruce. It was another Borah triumph. But meanwhile it is a fact that France did advance the 6,000,000 livres as a gift.

In much the same way, Mr. Borah has gained certain strategic victories in his demand for a more liberal policy toward Russia. As precedent, he cites the Washington Administration's recognition of a France as bloody and disorganized as Russia is supposed to be today. Washington's Cabinet faced the same problem, he declares, and unanimously decided to accord recognition. The Senator apparently forgets, or slurs over the fact, that his hero, Alexander Hamilton, proposed to so hedge around recognition that it would have been a meaningless gesture. Nor does he point out that it was Jefferson's honest mind which prevailed over the views of Hamilton and his clique in the Cabinet.

These seem trifling things, and they are, as politics go. They are done almost daily by Mr. Borah's more obscure fellows. But in the great Idaho seer they seem somehow incongruous and discreditable. His many failures, though sometimes more magnificent than his lesser colleagues' successes, loom large because of the high expectations he arouses. If he has come to be regarded throughout the country as the foremost trimmer in American public life today he has only himself to blame.

FIVE PORTRAITS ON GALVANIZED IRON

BY BENJAMIN DE CASSERES

James Branch Cabell

THE Watteau of ironists. The Bœcklin of romancers. The Debussy of prose. One day an Intellectual Faun found Cinderella, the Little Girl That Was Always Pushed in the Corner, moping near the American Outhouses of Realism. He took her by the hand and walked straight up to the Wall of Excluded Facts and disappeared with her Beyond Life into the Magic Country of Poictesme, where he became Jurgen and she the Lady Ettarre. It was a strange land, full of witches and demons, virginal kobolds and scatalogic monks, blasé Lohengrins and Doll Tearsheets in royal doo-dads, swineherd kings and Knights of the Holy Lingam, queens sitting-for-company and Norns weaving patterns of Life and Death. And the Censors peered through the Wall of Excluded Facts and saw they could do nothing in the matter and also wished they were Intellectual Fauns and could find a Cinderella. But so it was, and thus it remains to this day.

Cabell hardly seems to write above a whisper. The footfall of his sentences hardly resounds at all in the corridors of my skull. He weaves with closed eyes. He talks with a closed mouth. He is like a man who seems to create while listening. He has never learned his art. It is the mood of his genius—cold, serene, aloof. His emotions are purely cerebral. I often think of him as the Spinoza of word-magic.

Manuel the Redeemer may turn out to be Cabell the Redeemer in disguise. The minds of literary America must be turned toward the heavens—the heavens of Imagination and Irony. Even Sinclair Lewis believes photography is satire, while Dreiser believes that reporting is creating. America cannot live by Pulitzer and Dial prizes alone. Sherwood Anderson and Carl Sandburg have got Kleig eyes from observing the obvious too closely. The whole band of American realists is infected with movie psychology—recognition, the booby fear of the unfamiliar, “tell us what we know something about.” “To hell with that!” Cabell has said as he picked up his Cinderella and made off for Poictesme, as hereinbefore mentioned.

In this sense he may be the redeemer—the redeemer from seriousness, “humanitarianism” and stupefying sincerity. Cabell’s tongue is always in his cheek. Madame Maya, alias Make-Believe, is the gorgeous wench who rules things mundane. Play in with her, not against her, advises Cabell. All redeemers are romantic liars. Whether they are called Buddha, Shakespeare, Christ, Mark Twain, Mrs. Eddy, Victor Hugo, Krishnamurti, Balzac, Mahomet, Lord Dunsany or James Branch Cabell, they all come to purge the world of facts, to cover up with gorgeous counterpanes the filthy mattresses of reality.

Catch them while they’re young! This has always been the slogan of Mother Church. Sound psychology. So I would get right to work on the geographies in our schools and substitute on the maps where the United States and England appear, for instance, maps of Dunsanyland, Alice’s Wonderland and Cabell’s Poictesme. If Emmanuel Swedenborg could blue-print Heaven—all but naming the theatres and speak-easies in its principal cities—why haven't we Romantics the same privilege? In Poictesme are many mansions also. The capital of the Benighted States may be Washington, but Bellegarde is a far more delectable place for the imaginative sojourn of our children. We teach that Loose Chewing is President of the country and that some non-Wasserman-tested egomaniac is dictator of another. But in Poictesme there are Jurgen, Dom Manuel, Coth, Anaïtis, King Smoit, Yolande, Guenevere, Gawr and a thousand other mirific beings of far more interest than the long line of scoundrels and oafs that my children are taught to look upon as heroes (Racca!). Catch them young, I say—and dose their little brains with Lewis Carroll, Lord Dunsany and James Branch Cabell. Unfit them for life? Yes, but fit them to live!

It may be that Cabell is the Prometheus of an American Renaissance—which will be the triumph of the Chimera over the Bull.

Edgar Lee Masters

SOME one once said that De Maupassant had cut down the giant oak Flaubert and made walking-sticks of it. So Edgar Lee Masters, in "The Spoon River Anthology," has taken the vast panoramic canvas of Balzac and reduced it to exquisite vest-pocket etchings.

"The Spoon River Anthology" is one of the most original pieces of imaginative literature that I know of. Implacable ironist and realist, Masters, Prospero of a Middle Western graveyard, struck with the wand of creation upon the lidded skeletons of the dead and made them tell (as all things must out) their secrets to the world.

Yoricks, Hamlets and Ophelias, Hulots, Cousin Bettas and De Rastignacs, Quilps, Micawbers and Lady Deadlocks, Bovarys, Moreaus and Saint Anthonys, Raskolnikoffs, Karamazoffs and Bazaroffs, Romeos, Don Quixotes and Long John Silvers, Lorna Doones, Becky Sharps and Maud Mullers exist externally in flesh and blood wherever a thousand people live and weave and interweave their passions, dreams, loves and ambitions. They all live in Spoon River under the names that Masters has given them, and his great art consists in portraying their lives, their tragedies and comedies, and the vast inutility of it all, in the most condensed and vivid form conceivable.

The vulgar, uninteresting, commonplace being does not exist for the dramatist and the poet of high breed. He will sensé drama, poetry, an epic, in three men surrounding a young girl who laps an ice-cream soda. The ironic imagination is the resurrection and the life. It glows and transfigures in all the splendor of its malignant power in the Masters of the Anthology. After that his work lives in the reflected light of that first fresh burst of genius.

I would rather have been the author of "The Spoon River Anthology" than of any other book of American imaginative literature except Cabell's "Jurgen." I do not know of any poetic fiction that gives me such an odor of reality, such a raw, rank taste of broken hearts and battered brains, such a sense of inexorable fatality. Masters does not describe; he creates, and his only ethic is the ethic of all great creators, pathos and irony, which are implicit in the pictures he evokes like overtones between his lines.

The formula of Masters is the formula of life itself. His creations rise from their graves as we rise out of the womb, tell their story, as we enact ours, and then return to their sleep, as we shall return to ours.

Ultimate judgment of all things planetary must be written, In re: Mankind against the Gods. Spoon River is the planet. The Author of Life must answer for His work to the Soul of Man. Masters holds a brief for Man, is an attorney, as it were, for the prosecution.

He is not a great poet in the narrow sense of the word. But he is a great poet if by great poet we mean one who sees the particular, the individual under the aspect of Eternity or Law. "The Spoon River Anthology" is our Comédie Humaine.

I met Masters many years after reading "The Spoon River Anthology." It was in the Players Club and he wanted to ask me about the motion-picture possibilities of another one of his books. I could discern nothing in him, in our short talk, that was extraordinary. He was matter of fact and looked matter of fact. I did not mention that I had ever read his Anthology. It is curious how two creative natures, when they are brought together for the first time, examine each other, spar silently with one another, each fearing to hear an adverse judgment on his work. Artists are the greatest moral cowards, I think.

But I know of no man in English literature who has put so much in so little as Edgar Lee Masters has in "The Spoon River Anthology."

Nicholas Vachel Lindsay

NICHOLAS VACHEL LINDSAY, the jazz Blake. Saint Francis of Assisi playing the saxophone at the Fireman's Ball. Gabriel grinding a barrel-organ as General William Ballington Booth and William Jennings Bryan drag into Heaven John L. Sullivan, soused to the thatch.

The foundation of jazz lies in the dithyramb. The saxophone was immanent in that passionate hymn to the glory of Dionysius chanted by the midnight sons and sun-kissed daughters of the ancient world to the accompaniment of crapulous flutes. Ecstasy, dithyramb, mænadic choral fury, jazz: that's the genealogy of our present musical "immorality." Further transvaluations and degradations of the wild Bacchic dithyrambs: the American camp-meeting, Negro spirituals and Billy Sundayism. Further transvaluation but not degradation of the dithyramb: the colossal egomania of Walt Whitman, my own best prose style and the poetry of Nicholas Vachel Lindsay, celestial jazzite, dithyrambic wastrel-singer, the one original, authentic soil-poet practising the most ancient and honorable profession in the world in America today.

I return to Lindsay's seven or eight volumes of poetry and prose (and all his prose is a series of picture-poems) with increasing pleasure each year. He lifts me out of my boots of Dreiserian realism. He puts thunder-beating wings on my shoulders, bowed down by the massive weight of Sherwood Anderson and the clumsy rhyme-chopped prose of Carl Sandburg. How did this nightingale Vachel ever get into the monkey-house of American poetry? To answer that one must answer that pre-Devonian wheeze: What is Genius? Which I leave to Irving Babbitt.

I could take, say, twenty poems of five American "imagist" poets, the same number of five free-verse realists and the same number of Walker's rhymsters, juggle them in three bags and have a drawing. I defy one sharp in a hundred to tell me which from which, what from what, or who from who so far as the author goes. Only Lindsay's poems, if he got into the bags, would be instantly recognizable. Because he is an individual—the rarest thing in life and the arts; because he is elemental de facto—not by profession; because, above all, he has the rarest gift, vouchsafed also to Blake and Whitman, of compressing the eternal in the matter-of-fact. "The Daniel Jazz," "John L. Sullivan, the Strong Man of Boston," "To Mary Pickford," "William Jennings Bryan," "General William Ballington Booth Enters Heaven" and "Euclid," for instance, are done sub specie eternitatis. I fear that Lindsay, avowed Prohibitionist, will some day write a poem on my most fascinating vice and lure me forever into the embattled ranks of Volstead!

What is essentially American today? I ram my Aaron's rod into this Melting Pot and tap the abysmal underground waters.

Spout forth: Camp-meeting, circus, the Negro croon, and pioneers! O Pioneers! We are the Beethovens of Dissonance. Cultured clowns. Size! size! size! Moody and Sankey, Barnum, the Dollar, Kingdom Come. All this is in the work of Vachel Lindsay, whimsically, grotesquely, sometimes ethereally transfigured, as in those superb poems, "The Chinese Nightingale" and "The Golden Whales of California." All things go into the fennel-rod of our Springfield Prometheus, even some of the great Old Testament rant. He is both child and Titan—which is America. He is both realist and idealist—which is America. He is both raw and sentimental—which is America.

I am a good enough American to believe that my country 'tis of thee is going straight to perdition unless we soon get a damned good licking. We must make the descent to Avernus before we achieve the Elysian Fields of art and culture. Our pride is now jay-walking before a fall.

But it's good to meet on the way a careless, saintly-Nietzschean soul who chants "Boom-boom-boom-a-laddy-boom—let us celebrate our descent with song. We are going to hell—but so did Orpheus! Bing-bang! The Going is the thing. Some of us are going on Pegasus, some on Rosinante, and some on wooden rocking-horses—but, anyhow, boom-boom-boom-a-laddy-boom! Here's my Handy Guide for all you beggars. Carry the flame of Beauty in your Volsteady breast—that is all ye need to know!"

That's about the way, I take it, Lindsay feels about the more or less important matter of this wreck of liberties and crush of dictators. It is tonic. It is uproarious. Let the heavens fall in—but Vachel will sing! There is no good; there is no evil. Whatever is, is poetry.

Can anything more childlike and bland be conceived than this poem, "To Reformers in Despair:"

'Tis not too late to build our young land right, Cleaner than Holland, courtlier than Japan,
Devout like early Rome, with hearths like hers, Hearths that will recreate the breed called men.

I quote this piece of rigmarole merely to show what happens to a great poet when he gets snared in Tolstoy's whiskers. This sort of stuff does not belong to the Hobo of Beauty.

Does any one recall the Cocaine Buddha, Slick-Slack Kopensky and the Edgar Lee Masters Tower of Truth? "The Golden Book of Springfield" is an almost forgotten work of Lindsay's. It is his "Wild Duck," his book of auto-satire. It is Springfield, Illinois, a hundred years from now, and the Cocaine Buddha has succeeded Bacchus. Slick-Slack Kopensky, the Mayor of every American city today, is still doing business. From the Edgar Lee Masters Tower of Truth one can see all the soda-water stands in the city—for those who do not patronize the Cocaine Buddha. In a word, America has become the Athens of Bunk. It is ruled by a Soda Fountain King and cocaine bootleggers. If this Golden Book of Irony is not the finest work on my country 'tis of thee ever done in silent Gargantuan belly-chuckles, then may my brain turn to Methodist mush and may my gullet wither of its thirst.

Speaking of thirst, I know only one personal fact about Nicholas Vachel Lindsay: he is a member in good standing of the Illinois Anti-Saloon League. And that is the sole reason why I have refused three times to meet this heaven-anointed enemy of the great Fundamentalist God, Bacchus.

Sadakichi Hartmann

A GROTESQUE etched in flesh by the drunken Goya of Heaven. A grinning, obscene gargoyle on the Temple of American Letters. Superman-bum. Half God, half Hooligan; all artist. Anarch, sadist, satyr. A fusion of Jap and German, the ghastly experiment of an Occidental on the person of an Oriental. Sublime, ridiculous, impossible. A genius of the ateliers, picture studios, gin-mills and East Side lobsouse restaurants. A dancing dervish, with graceful, Garganluan feet and a mouth like the Cloaca Maxima. A painter out of Hakusai, Manet, Monet, Whistler. Result: fantastic realism. A colossal ironist, a suave pessimist, a Dionysiac wobbly.

Hartmann has the gift of elusiveness in all he writes. Ironic elusiveness is the hardest thing to achieve, even if one is born to it, or, rather, if it is born unto one. With Sadakichi it is a gift. His "The Last Thirty Days of Christ" is a superb piece of work, glowingly vivid, elusively ironic, and conveying such a sense of reality, of plausibility, that it carries with it, to me at least, the aura of inspiration, of a piecing together of some remembered adventure. He has put the veritable Jesus on paper as the rationalized, civilized, messianic-free mind conceives Him: an itinerant mystic with the thunders of evangelical propaganda locked in His subconscious nature; a hobo yogi who occasionally went into trances; a pantheist who passionately loved with a mystical furor whatever was alive; a man of vast humor and vast pity; a little of the mountebank, sincere by auto-suggestion.

Hartmann in his book pictures to us the disciples of Christ with quick strokes of his brush—raw, human, ignorant wastrels, bums, pick-plates and rustic go-getters. So long as Jesus can show them where a free meal is to be had or a few pennies picked up they will believe in His mission.

They stand out in all their naked, everyday vulgarity and terre-à-terre humanity on Sadakichi's canvas like the persons in the pictures of Frans Hals. The humor of "miracles"—the humor of the rationalization of the most incredible credulity of which we have any knowledge—provokes an enormous satisfaction in the brain of the reader because of their plausibility.

Out of this book a Goya or a Daumier could make a series of pictures that would forever blow the Christ-myth on to the rubbish heap of human stupidities as effectively as Cervantes blew chivalry to atoms in "Don Quixote"—if it is ever advisable to destroy a beautiful myth, which is an open question in my mind so far as the masses are concerned. In the minds of artists there is no conflict between an ironic fact and a gorgeous fiction.

Three A.M. in a private room over a saloon-restaurant (Mrs. Hoburg's) at Third avenue and Fourteenth street. Sadakichi dancing for an hour his grotesque, obscene, maniacal dances. Unforgettable hour.

Or Sadakichi in Jack's at 4 A.M., ordering lobster and beer for six of us and walking out as the check is presented. Unforgettable bilk.

Or Sadakichi doing his dervish dances in Joel's at 5 A.M., passing around the hat among the boozers, one of whom kicks the hat full of cash in the air, Sadakichi throwing a tableful of glasses in our faces. Unforgettable rough-house.

Sadakichi Hartmann was born out of his age. He was a man who belonged in Cellini's gang or with the rowdy geniuses of the Mermaid Tavern.

Edwin Markham

EDWIN MARKHAM is the Blessed Damozel of American poetry. He is decent, flawless, virginal. He is an artist, a craftsman sans reproche but not sans peur.

Can you conceive of Mrs. Grundy astride Pegasus? No more than you could conceive of Lohengrin riding on the horn of Satan. Well, Edwin Markham has achieved the inconceivable. For he is really Mrs. Grundy riding Pegasus, the veritable Pegasus, for Edwin Markham is a real poet, sometimes a great poet, but always a poet.

Markham, with all his defects of platinous idealism, puritanical sex-prudence, sentimental metaphysics and dedication flap-doodle, is steeped in the ecstasy of eternal. There is a touch of crazy beauty in him, too. And he has caught the wild music of the Angel Israfil. But he is hopelessly of America, with its paste humanitarianism, its paste optimism, its paste culture.

He is productive but uncreative. He sticks to the old forms, the old metaphors, the old lilt, the old griefs, with suddenly a line or simile of mirific magic leaping forth from the page like a dazzling dragon-fly out of a New England mince-pie. Many, many of his poems are the products of an Eddie Guest who has read Shelley—sheer rubbish. He is preoccupied with the dream of mediocre minds—Social Regeneration. His Muse is half the time on a soap-box. The poison of Jesus is in his blood and eats up the red corpuscles of unregenerate sin and lyrical diablerie. The syphilis of theology is in his veins. The pox of redemption disfigures his Endymion.

There is in Markham's poetry a gorgeous music—sometimes Miltonic, sometimes Swinburnian as in "The Crowning Hour":

I saw you there with the sea-girls fleeing,
And I followed you fast over rock and reef;
And you sent a sea-fire into my being,
The lure of the lyric grief.

And he has the magic of the great line:
We are caught in the coils of a God's romances.

Or:

A spider bars the road with filmy ropes
Where once the feet of Carthage thundered by.

It is the fashion to make light of "The Man with the Hoe." Aside from its sentimentality, it is technically, to me, a great poem. There are vastness, power and passion in it. It is Markham on his soap-box, but his soap-box is a star.

Markham at seventy-four is a great big, back-slapping, bawling boy. He praises every one indiscriminately. The man, personally, is incapable of an evil thought, an evil act. He is the gushing, love-thy-neighbor Christian.

He hasn't the slightest doubt in his own mind that he is the greatest American poet, the Voice of the Age, the Light-bringer, the Anointed One. He used to pride himself on his resemblance to Victor Hugo; but I have never found in Markham any of Hugo's pomposity. And withal shrewd, for I doubt whether he would ever write a poem that did not have a market value.

Edwin Markham has proved that Demos and Prometheus are not enemies.

THE CATHOLIC PRESS

BY WILLIAM C. MURPHY, JR.

IN 1808 Father Gabriel Richard, later territorial delegate from Michigan, and, as such, the only Catholic priest ever to have a seat in the House of Representatives, paid a visit to Baltimore. His chief purpose was to report to Archbishop Carroll on religious conditions in the wilds of Michigan, but while he was in the metropolis of the Free State he purchased a printing-press and a font of type. Back over the Alleghenies, across river and prairie, and through wilderness and swamp, this equipment was carried to Michigan, and Father Richard set up his plant in Springwells, a village near Detroit. It was from his press that the first Catholic newspaper printed in the United States was produced, on August 31, 1809.

There was only one issue of the Michigan Essay, or, Impartial Observer; probably the name was too heavy a burden. But from that beginning has developed one of the most powerful agencies for controlling opinion in the United States today. Ayer's Newspaper Directory for 1926 lists 851 American religious publications, and 160 of them are Catholic. The Catholic Press Directory, published by Joseph H. Meier, of Chicago, enumerates 104 more, or 264, but this list includes many parochial weeklies, local sodality organs, and similar trivial publications. So far as I have been able to ascertain by a rather thorough-going check-up, Ayer lists all of the Catholic newspapers of any real importance except Col. Patrick H. Callahan's organ, the Record of Louisville, of which more later.

Ayer's list includes two dailies, 110 weeklies, two semi-monthlies, forty-one monthlies, one bi-monthly, and four quar-terlies. Of the weeklies, seventy-six are published in English, nine in German, six in Polish, five in Italian, five in Bohemian, five in Spanish, two in Hungarian, and two in Lithuanian. The dailies are the Daily American Tribune of Dubuque, and Narod (Bohemian) of Chicago. As to circulation, Our Sunday Visitor of Huntington, Ind., with a sworn statement claiming 503,065, leads the field by many thousands, save for Columbia, the official organ of the Knights of Columbus, a monthly published at New Haven, Conn. Columbia has an A.B.C. circulation of 750,000. The greater part of this circulation is, of course, among the Knights themselves, since every member of the order is ipso facto a subscriber to its magazine. Among the weeklies and dailies the leaders are: the Providence Visitor, with 28,449; the Pilot of Boston, with 50,000; the Catholic News of New York, with 50,000; the Catholic Standard and Times of Philadelphia, with 35,000; the New World of Chicago, with 67,000; the Catholic Review of Baltimore, with 24,000; and the Daily American Tribune of Dubuque, with 17,784.

The last named, however, is the only one in the group offering A.B.C. figures. In fact, of all the Catholic publications listed by Ayer, only five give such figures. The four others are Columbia; the Katolick, a Bohemian semi-weekly of Chicago, with 8,133 circulation; Extension, a monthly of Chicago, with 319,169; and Truth, a monthly of New York, with 60,298. This curious refusal to supply advertisers with reliable circulation figures is responsible for the conspicuous absence of national advertising from the greater part of the American Catholic press. Of the 264 publications listed by Meier, thirty-nine failed to supply any circulation figures at all. The remaining 225 claimed a combined circulation of 6,414,613.

All of the Catholic publications which make any pretense of supplying their readers with news—as distinguished from material of a purely pietistic character—are subscribers to the National Catholic Welfare Conference News Service. It has long been the theory of that organization that a story sent out by it and printed by every subscribing paper will reach approximately 7,000,000 readers. Some of this circulation, it is true, would be outside of the United States, but at least 95% of it would be among American Catholics and for the most part, English-speaking American Catholics. The estimate sounds rather high, but it can be demonstrated statistically, if that means anything. Thus the N. C. W. C. News Service constitutes an almost ideal agency for influencing opinion. Imagine a potential audience of 20,000,000, all bound tightly together by certain fundamental beliefs, and then picture an agency able to reach all of its more literate members every week, and you come very near to describing a propagandist's dream of perfection. True, this potential audience is divided, to an extent seldom realized outside the Church, by racial animosities, by petty parochial jealousies, and by bickerings over prerogatives. But on issues touching fundamentals there is a common background which makes for quick and definite mobilization of opinion. The late Pope Pius X was well aware of the fact when he said: "In vain will you found missions and build schools if you are not able to wield the offensive and defensive weapons of a loyal Catholic press."

In that frank sentence the Pope summarized the Church's conception of the function of the Catholic press. It must be "the offensive and defensive weapons" of the Church—not, primarily for the dissemination of information or the stimulation of intellectual and literary activity, but simply for the uses of the Church. He who writes or talks about the Catholic press without a realization of that fact simply wastes his time on superficialities. Herein lies the justification for the criticism, frequently and plausibly made, that the editorial pages of Catholic publications do not give evidence of any independent thinking. The reason is that, under the existing scheme of things, they deal almost exclusively with subjects bearing directly on the faith—and the Church, as everyone knows, employs methods other than editorial discussion—particularly by lay editors!—to settle questions of faith. ♪

An extremely talented and somewhat eccentric priest, now dead, who formerly edited a ragged-looking Catholic weekly in the Far West, once declared on his editorial page that "most of the present day Catholic papers were founded as Irish political journals and got religion in seasons of drouth and depression." His statement was not entirely accurate, but it is a fact that some of the journals that have now "got religion" were once almost purely political publications and engaged violently in twisting the British lion's tail. A few of their early fellows remain unsaved to this day, and whatever else they may be, they are not dull or lacking in independence of viewpoint. It is thus the purely religious character of the present Catholic papers, rather than any feebleness of intellect in their editors, which gives so much dull sameness to their editorial pages. Let us analyze a few typical specimens.

There is, for example, the New World of Chicago, which at times prints as many as twenty-four pages and during the Eucharistic Congress last June printed an edition of seventy-two pages. Normally, it presents a dignified and pleasing typographical appearance. In times of stress, however,—as during the Eucharistic Congress—it makes the mistake all too common among its weekly colleagues and adopts a florid Hearstian type-dress. Thus the issue which coincided with the beginning of the Eucharistic Congress bore a flaring page-line in letters two inches deep announcing "The Great Congress Opens."

In New York there is a paper that runs to the other extreme. It is the Catholic News, one of the anomalies of Catholic journalism. Published in the greatest Catholic news center outside of Rome, it is the dullest looking of any of the Catholic weeklies. In size the same as the current tabloids, it is anything but tab-like in appearance; indeed, it suggests nothing else so much as a strayed magazine section from the Sunday edition of some particularly dull daily. If a reader is persistent enough, he can find the important items in the News—probably tucked in between the accounts of parish sodality meetings on Page 25. It habitually prints more than thirty pages, liberally garnished with advertisements. Its editorials are well written and, perhaps a trifle more independent in tone than the average in Catholic weeklies. Its news is buried, but when found it turns out to be set forth in decent English.

In Boston there is the Pilot, for many years the unofficial Bible of the Irish Catholic immigrant, wherever he might be. With the rise of other diocesan organs it has lost some of its national following, but is still one of the outstanding Catholic journals of the nation. And it is close to the top of that select list of religious papers which really make money. A part of this success is due, no doubt, to the operation of a circulation system whereby every pastor in the archdiocese is made responsible—and billed—for a definite number of subscriptions, based on the population of his parish. The system evoked terrific, though discreetly muffled, howls from priests and faithful when it was put into effect, but it has worked. Since that time it has also brought results in other dioceses. The columns of the Pilot are well filled with advertisements and, on the whole, it presents a prosperous front.

The Pilot is carefully edited in its news columns, and, as the personal organ of Cardinal O'Connell, ranking prelate of the Catholic hierarchy in the United States, its editorial columns frequently point the way to more timid contemporaries when controversial issues are under discussion. With its masthead legend, "Established by the Second Bishop of Boston in 1829," it takes issue with the Catholic Encyclopedia, which says that the Cincinnati Catholic Telegraph, established in 1831, is now the oldest surviving Catholic publication in the United States. As a matter of fact, the paper established by Bishop Fenwick in 1829 was called the Jesuit, or, Catholic Sentinel. In the same year it became the Catholic Intelligencer, but soon resumed its original name. In 1834 that name was changed again to the Irish and Catholic Sentinel; in 1835 to the Literary and Catholic Sentinel (probably the first stirrings of a desire to please the Brahmins) and in 1836 to the Boston Pilot. Subsequently the Boston was dropped.

Philadelphia is the home of the prosperous but dull Catholic Standard and Times, edited by John A. Gallagher, one of the really competent newspaper men in Catholic journalism. One cannot avoid the feeling that if prosperity were less gracious or competition more keen, Mr. Gallagher would make his paper far more interesting than it is. Typographically, it is probably nearer to perfection than any other Catholic weekly newspaper and its news columns show only good English. Editorially, it is stodgy, save on the rare occasions when it takes umbrage at some anti-Catholic story in the secular press. On these occasions the Standard and Times shows what it might be if there were more obstacles in its way. It has forced retractions from even the haughty Curtis publications. Together with the Pilot it is addicted to the amusing monarchism of always referring to the local Cardinal Archbishop simply as His Eminence or His Eminence, the Cardinal. One might read the Standard and Times for all eternity without discovering that the Archbishop of Philadelphia is Monsignor Dennis J. Dougherty, or the Pilot for a similar period without being apprised that William Henry O'Connell, A.B., is Archbishop of Boston.

One of the liveliest of the Catholic weeklies is the Indiana Catholic and Record, official organ of the diocese of Indianapolis. It is edited by Joseph P. O'Mahony, formerly a political writer for Indianapolis newspapers and before that a reporter in Baltimore. O'Mahony's connection with pious journalism has in no whit lessened his interest in politics nor his curiously ardent devotion to the Republican party—a devotion equalled, but not surpassed, by his Anglophobia. Even during the World War, when the hands-across-the-sea buncombe was sedulously fostered, his paper was violently acrimonious in all its references to Britain, the accursed enemy of his native Ireland. It is a rare issue of the Indiana Catholic and Record that does not contain a catalogue of the iniquities of the League of Nations, the World Court, and the Democratic party. O'Mahony has long been an ardent admirer of the Hon. Jim Watson, currently a Senator from the State of Indiana and an aspirant to the Presidency. During Jim's hide-and-seek with the Klan in late years, and particularly at the time it was trying to nominate him for Vice-President at Cleveland in 1924, this devotion has been somewhat embarrassing to O'Mahony. At one time he went to the extreme length of publishing an editorial intimating that he was somewhat disappointed by the Senator's limber maneuvers. But that was only another "Maggie and I are out" affair.

Of all the Catholic weekly newspapers, the two which most nearly approximate the secular dailies are the Providence Visitor and the Tablet of Brooklyn. They are well-edited, newsful sheets, carefully printed, and showing evidence of editorial discrimination in their display of news. The Tablet is edited by a layman; the Providence Visitor by a priest. Our Sunday Visitor has been alluded to heretofore. It is one of the mysteries of American journalism, and its immense circulation can be explained only by assuming a gift for super-salesmanship in its founder, Monsignor Noll, now Bishop of Fort Wayne. It is produced in one of the finest printing establishments in the United States, but its type-dress and general appearance conceal that fact very successfully. Occasionally, it prints news items but only to give point to the eloquent expository articles that fill its four meagre pages. Take a typical number:

Page 1 bears a page-line such as the New York American might use to announce the solution of the Hall-Mills murder, reading "The Primacy and Infallibility of the Pope." There are nine stories on the page, with headlines reading respectively: "St. Peter Was Certainly First Bishop of Rome," "A Good Exegesis of St. Matthew xvi, 19", "What Protestant Theologians and Leaders Confess", "A Brilliant Confutation of an Anglican Divine", "Scriptural and Patristic Proofs of the Petrine Claim", "Where the Body of St. Peter Now Reposes", "The Primacy of Peter", "Papal Infallibility—What it Is and What it Is Not", and "The Words 'Peter' and 'Rock' in Six Languages." The story headed "Papal Infallibility—What it Is and What it Is Not" develops on closer inspection to be an address delivered by the late Very Rev. Bernard Vaughan, S.J., before the Young Men's Society Conference, at Sheffield, England. But it is accorded the place of honor on Page 1, as being spot news, so to speak.

Page 2 contains a two-column editorial on "The Pope and His Enemies," which turns out to be an explanation of the theory of the Temporal Power. There are also continuations of two of the articles started on Page 1, and a coupon soliciting offerings "to help lift the debt on the Catechist Mission School." Page 3 is devoted to one of the familiar question-box departments labeled "Bureau of Information," and contains also continuations of three of the articles started on Page 1. Page 4, save for two short fillers aggregating less than half a column, is devoted to continuations of two more Page 1 articles and to a short continuation of the Bureau of Information. There are approximately three columns of advertising, including patent medicines and a classified section. Yet this paper, according to its publishers' sworn statement, has a circulation of more than half a million copies weekly! Certain it is an exceptional Catholic Church door anywhere in these United States at which Our Sunday Visitor is not sold after masses on Sunday. It has even penetrated dioceses from which solicitors for other Catholic papers have been chased with bell, book, and candle for daring to poach on the territory of the diocesan organ.

III

Of the weekly reviews, probably America, published by the Jesuits in New York, is the best known. Its literary standards are high and it presents a very dignified appearance. According to gossip in circles which should be well informed, the members of the American hierarchy read America, and particularly its editorials, far more faithfully and with much greater attention than they read any other publication, Catholic or not. In consequence its editorial favor is widely sought by persons harboring plans needing Catholic support. America has been an enthusiastic advocate of the movement to combat bureaucratic centralization at Washington and its editors were denouncing Volsteadism at a time when other Catholic ecclesiastics were prudently watching the weather vanes.

The Commonweal, established about two years ago by Michael Williams and a group of Catholic intellectuals calling itself the Calvert Associates, has made a brave effort to build up a review of the arts, literature, and public affairs which will stand comparison with G. K. Chesterton's weekly. There is no official connection between the Commonweal and the Catholic Church, the theory being that the publication should be Catholic in philosophy and tone but not a religious journal in the usual sense. This lack of official status is both an advantage and a handicap. It enables the paper to speak its mind more freely than the other Catholic weeklies—although it has been rather discreet for the most part—but at the same time it robs its utterances of the authority which those of an official publication would have. The Commonweal has demonstrated that there are capable writers on things Catholic in America outside the clergy. If it is able to survive the diseases of infancy and become safely self-supporting, it will serve also to prove the existence of a Catholic reading public in the United States capable, intellectually, of appreciating what it has to offer.

Aside from America and the Commonweal, both commentators on current happenings, comparable to the Nation and New Republic, there are numerous other Catholic publications in the non-newspaper class. There is, for example, the Catholic World, a monthly edited by the Paulist Fathers in New York. It prints fiction occasionally, but most of its space is devoted to expository articles of rather high merit. The Sign, published by the Passionists at Union City, N. J., has been making strides as a monthly within the past few years and now maintains a literary standard on a par with that of the Catholic World. Then there are such publications as the Homiletic and Pastoral Review and the Ecclesiastical Review, clerical trade journals as their names imply, but carefully edited and surprisingly interesting for lay readers. In fact, certain parts of the Ecclesiastical Review—for example, the section in which questions relating to dogma and pastoral duties are propounded by priests and answered by learned theologians—supply the nearest approach to spice or lively controversy in the whole range of the American Catholic press. But unfortunately for Catholic flaming youth, much of this section is printed in Latin.

The primate of Catholic journalism in the United States is the American Catholic Quarterly Review, which had its golden age in the time of Orestes A. Brownson and maintains high literary standards to this day. Changed taste, indeed, has made it a quaint reminder of a more profound and cautious culture. A glance at its contents page shows articles entitled "Phases of the Picturesque", "Mulier Fortis", "Notes of a Pilgrim to Cascia", "The Inspiration of Scripture", "The Price of Peace", "Lisieux at the Present Day", "In Nature's Realm" and "Education, Freedom, and Democracy."

From these austere heights we descend to the enfant terrible of American Catholic journalism, the Fortnightly Review, published at St. Louis by Arthur Preuss, a member of a family which was prominent in the early history of Catholic newspaperdom in America. Formerly his paper was called the Catholic Fortnightly Review. The change was made several years ago, so it is said, at the urgent request of the Most Reverend Archbishop of St. Louis, for satisfactory archiepiscopal reasons. The Review, in its present unchurched form, intersperses short articles of a really scholarly nature on dogmatic and ritualistic subjects with the most dyspeptic of attacks and criticisms—levelled impartially at its non-German Catholic contemporaries and at the Masonic order. It is the Jersey mosquito of current Catholic journalism.

At the other extreme is Thought, described as "a quarterly of the sciences and letters", which made its bow last June. The first number was well up to the standard forecast by the selection of the brilliant Jesuits who make up its board of editors. Its editor-in-chief is the Rev. Wilfrid Parsons, S.J., who is also editor of America. The style of the new quarterly may be surmised from the titles of some of its articles: "The Catholic Church in the United States", a "sesquicentennial essay" by the Rev. Dr. Peter Guilday; "Miguel Molinos, Spanish Quietist", by Montgomery Carmichael; "Fine American Silver of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries", by Marie T.-M. Marique; "Christianity at Lausanne", by William H. McClellan;

"The Practical Hygiene of the Church", a rather startling interpretation of the Liturgical Year as a glorification of some of the ideas currently disseminated through Mr. Macfadden's brood of publications, by Richard A. Muttkowski. There is a lengthy and scholarly book-review section and no editorial page. This last lack is an example of artistic restraint probably without precedent in ecclesiastical journalism, Catholic or non-Catholic.

Columbia, the Knights of Columbus magazine, has been mentioned before. Until Myles Connolly took charge of it about two years ago it was a rather scraggly affair, inclined to be overly pietistic and with dubious literary standards. Under the present régime, however, it has blossomed forth amazingly. Occasionally it prints fiction of real merit; its feature articles, while always safely orthodox, are interesting; and its editorials are far above the average. Being the only K. C. publication of national circulation it exercises a far-reaching influence among the Knights.

IV

The majority of the Catholic editors repudiate Volsteadism and all its works and pomps, but most of them are somewhat cautious. The True Voice, of Omaha, presents a typical viewpoint, as follows:

Opponents of the Volstead Act and the Eighteenth Amendment now speak of nullification as an easy way to escape the results of the law. Nullification, however, is a rather dangerous way out of a bad situation. It is true that other constitutional amendments are now a dead letter through abandonment of attempts at enforcement. This may happen with Prohibition; but we scarcely expect it. It would leave the liquor traffic without control and this would be worse than our condition before the Volstead Act. Some may say that it would be no worse than our present condition; but that could be disputed. We want no nullification of our Prohibition laws. Modification may be in order, but surely it would be folly to throw away all the restraints that experience has shown to be necessary to lessen the dangers of the traffic in intoxicants.

A more hostile attitude is voiced by the Providence Visitor, which thus comments on the crumbs of encouragement to be gleaned by the wets from the public indignation that greeted President Coolidge's ukase authorizing the appointment of municipal and State officials as Federal agents:

It's too bad the public wasn't on to its job eight years ago. A little clear thinking about the whole Prohibition business at the start might have prevented the constitutional fangle that we have got into. As a matter of fact, the better instructed lawyers knew that the Prohibition Amendment never would fit into the then existing plan of American government. It was bound to create the situation that it has done, wherein its enforcement means violation of the American civic creed. The time has come when something must be done to break up a situation that is wholly intolerable. Prohibition is a colossal failure. Its enforcement has begotten evils that will be felt long after this generation has passed away. Every day of its existence adds to and aggravates the evil. Let's have an end of it.

When the Hon. William E. Borah, of Idaho, went into the Realm of Georgia and addressed the Protestant Ministers Association of that State on Prohibition Enforcement, he aroused the ire of the Catholic Union and Times, which is published by a company of which Bishop Turner is president. It declared that "one may believe that the Senator from Idaho is merely working up sentiment in behalf of himself for the day when the American people will have to choose the twenty-sixth President of the United States," and went on:

Like all dries, Senator Borah makes the Eighteenth Amendment the Constitution of the United States. Why did he not, we ask, tell his audience that the Fourteenth and the Fifteenth Amendments, which have been nullified by the action of the South, are just as important a part of the same Constitution as the Eighteenth? Why did he not call their attention to the fact that in all probability the North, which is asking for the nullification of the Eighteenth Amendment, has been spurred on by the Southern States that have rendered the enforcement of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments impossible?

And from the capital city of the Hoosier Satrapy of the Invisible Empire comes the following in the Indiana Catholic and Record:

According to literature issued by the dry forces, Prohibition is probably the liveliest question in the country today. It hasn't been more than two years since the same dry forces were telling the nation that the liquor question was as dead as slavery. We, too, believe in the resurrection of the dead.

Such are some typical expressions of Catholic editorial opinion on Prohibition. A slightly different viewpoint is presented by the Messenger, official organ of the diocese of Belleville, Ill., which quotes with approval an excerpt from resolutions adopted by the German Catholic Central Verein, as follows:

In no wise do we advocate the return of what has been termed the American saloon. Nor do we condone the evils which have grown out of the non-observance of the law, while we would wish to see the vendors of poisonous potions prosecuted vigorously and punished severely. Nor should any citizen abet their actions or condone them.

But broadly speaking, it may be said that the Catholic press of the United States is opposed to Prohibition. This opposition is reflected in countless editorials, ranging from the well-written ones of America to the ungrammatical protests of the humble parish bi-weeklies. There are two important reasons for this opposition. In the first place, Prohibition does violence to Catholic philosophy, which fixes individual responsibility far more definitely than does that of any of the so-called private-interpretation denominations. It is the Catholic viewpoint that all of man's natural appetites may be gratified within limits, but that each individual is responsible to the Almighty for abuses. The second reason is the extremely practical one that the Church has learned by bitter and costly experience that attempts to enforce moral laws through the police won't work. This latter reason may be only subconsciously in the minds of some of the Catholic editors, but it is important. Furthermore, the Church has never catalogued gloom as a virtue. These factors, and not the multiplicity of Irish Catholic saloon-keepers in pre-Volstead days, are responsible for the coolness of the Catholic papers toward Prohibition.

As I have said, there are exceptions. One is afforded by the Record of Louisville. This paper is the official organ of the diocese of Louisville and of Col. Patrick H. Callahan, an eminent manufacturer of varnish and amateur publicist. It was Colonel Callahan who rushed to the Fundamentalist auto-da-fé at Dayton, Tenn., in 1925 to assure his friend, the late William Jennings Bryan, that American Catholic opinion supported the latter's theology. A year before that Colonel Callahan, through the courtesy of Mr. Bryan, had appeared before the committee on resolutions of the Democratic National Convention in New York to assure it that the Catholics of the United States did not want the Democrats to denounce the Ku Klux Klan. And he has been active more recently, as is evidenced by an editorial in the Catholic Observer of Pittsburgh:

Three different persons have written in to ask us if we had seen a recent article in the Louisville Record, official organ of the diocese of Louisville, in which it was stated that a priest in Governor Al Smith's party to the Eucharistic Congress "attempted to stage a demonstration" in behalf of the Governor in Chicago, but that the affair "fell flat". The Record is edited by Benedict Elder, close friend and associate of Col. P. H. Callahan and a highly capable gentleman, and if he printed such a story it is safe to assume that he considered its source trustworthy. Colonel Callahan, in the voluminous correspondence with which he favors this office and several hundred others, has frequently made the statement that there is more intolerance and bitterness between the wets and dries than between Catholics and anti-Catholics. The Smith story in the Colonel's own official organ would seem to bear him out. Frankly, we would like to hear Colonel Callahan's opinion of Governor Smith. Everybody already knows that the Colonel prefers William Gibbs McAdoo to Governor Smith—a preference which he has every right to own or display whenever or wherever he chooses—at National Democratic Conventions, for instance. Does the Colonel prefer Wayne B. Wheeler to Smith, or "Honorarium" Upshaw from Georgia, or "Pussyfoot" Johnson, or Richmond Pearson Hobson, who cashed in handsomely to the tune of $171,000 for his work on behalf of the great cause of the Anti-Saloon League? Do not the Wheelers, Upshaws, Johnsons, Hobsons, etc., occupy a warm spot in the Colonel's heart at the same time that a paper which is undoubtedly close to the Colonel's control prints the above story about Governor Smith and the supposed priest who tried to "stage a demonstration" in behalf of the Governor? Who was the priest, Colonel? Who were some of the other witnesses? Had a priest attempted to stage a "demonstration" in behalf of the ultra-dry Senator Walsh of Montana, and had the demonstration fallen flat, would there have been room for that "news" in the official organ of the Diocese of Louisville?

The Catholic press has progressed immeasurably during the past decade and most of that progress has coincided with the existence of the N. C. W. C. News Service. This organization—a department and subsidiary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference—now serves eighty Catholic newspapers. Its sixty-seven subscribers in the Continental United States include every English language Catholic publication which pretends to supply news to its readers. The service is not intended for the literary reviews, the monthlies, and the other publications which do not class themselves as newspapers, although some of them subscribe for purposes of current information. The news service is not a "hand-out" or publicity organization. Its subscribers pay for what they get.

More than 35,000 words are sent out by the organization to its papers each week. The great bulk of this matter is in the form of mimeographed copy and of a clip-sheet, but there is also a supplementary daily wire service—embryonic as yet. Each week headquarters in Washington receives approximately 1000 words by cable from its correspondents in Rome, Paris, London, and Dublin. From Washington this cable service is distributed through an ingenious combination of mail and telegraph to the fifteen or twenty papers which subscribe for it. On special occasions the volume of news carried runs much higher. Prior to and during the Eucharistic Congress in Chicago, the N. C. W. C. Service sent out more than 85,000 words on this event, and more than 50,000 of the total were sent out of Chicago during the week of the Congress.

Supplementing the strictly news features of the service are a monthly editorial service of about 5000 words, made up of feature articles, editorials on national topics, book reviews, a bi-weekly dramatic letter by R. Dana Skinner during the Winter months, a bi-weekly motion picture letter, and a weekly Washington letter, purporting to give an authoritative analysis of all governmental doings of interest to Catholics. Fortunately for the service, the administrative committee of the National Catholic Welfare Conference selected the Rt. Rev. Philip R. McDevitt, Bishop of Harrisburg, as chairman of its press department. He is a man of learning, great sincerity and sound judgment.

So much for the merits of the N. C. W. C. News Service. Its weaknesses are those forced upon it by the character of its clientèle. At the outset, the rule was laid down by those who founded and endowed the service—the members of the Catholic hierarchy composing the National Catholic Welfare Conference—that only such news as had a direct Catholic interest could be carried. Many of the evil results which might be expected from such a rule have been avoided because of the wisdom used in selecting the director of the service, Justin McGrath, a capable newspaper man of wide experience, and in addition an executive of ability and tact. This last named attribute has been one which has been called into play many times since he assumed his position. For the gentleman between the devil and the deep blue sea was in no more ticklish position than that occupied by a newspaper man who tries to run a news service for employers who know next to nothing about newspapers and to sell his service to editors who, in the vast majority of cases, knew less. But Mr. McGrath has made good progress in the face of indifference, non-coöperation and thinly veiled hostility, coupled with petty carping and ignorant criticism that have moved several of his associates to throw up their hands in disgust. He has been rewarded by seeing among his subscribers a gradual growth in the ability to distinguish between a news story and an editorial. When the service was organized in 1920 there was hardly a Catholic newspaper whose make-up and general appearance did not excite the contempt of newspaper men. But for six years, now, the Catholic editors have been seeing news stories written in news form, carefully edited copy, and balanced headlines in the N. C. W. C. clip-sheet, and results are beginning to appear.

However, the handicap imposed by the prescription of "Catholic interests" remains and until it is removed the Catholic papers cannot be more than supplements to the secular dailies. Thus the question arises among their editors whether they should change their fundamental policy and attempt to supply their readers with secular as well as religious news—as do the religious dailies abroad and the Catholic foreign language dailies in the United States—or remain as they are. As things stand, they are obviously somewhat lopsided. A person relying for his knowledge of public affairs upon his Catholic weekly exclusively might well conceive a revision of the tariff as an attempt to change the duties on church bells or prayer-books; he might visualize Prohibition enforcement as an attempt to regulate the distribution of altar wine; and to him, a Presidential inauguration might be an account of the doings of Catholic nuns or priests who happened to view the procession.

Of course, the dissemination of general news cannot be effected by weekly papers. If the present policy is changed it means just one thing—Catholic dailies in all of the larger centers. That this possibility is in the minds of some editors is indicated by an article of Kevin Gavan in America. Here are his concluding paragraphs:

If the influence of the Catholic newspapers in the United States is to become what it could become, we will see Catholic dailies in several cities within the next decade or so. A brave start has been made by the Daily American Tribune of Dubuque, in a territory relatively poor in opportunities for such enterprise. That this paper has been able to exist at all indicates that a Catholic daily is not chimerical and could be profitable in some sections of the country. Possibly there are weighty and just reasons why Catholic dailies would be undesirable in the United States. If the authorities of the Church do not desire them, undoubtedly they will not be established; or if established they cannot prosper. Perhaps American conditions of life are not deemed adapted to a daily religious press.

This is very cautious stuff. But the idea will not down.

EDITORIAL

ONE of the crying needs of the time, in this imperial Republic, is for a suave and soothing burial service for the admittedly damned. I speak as one who has of late attended the funeral orgies of several such gentlemen, each time to my æsthetic distress. The first of them, having a great abhorrence of rhetoric, left orders that not a word was to be said. The result was two gruesome moments: when six of us walked into his house in utter silence and carried him out, and when we shoved him, in the same silence, into the crematory. The whole business was somehow unnatural and even a shade indecent: it seemed a brutal thing to dispatch so charming a fellow in so cavalier a fashion. The second funeral was even worse. The deceased was a Socialist of the militantly anti-clerical variety, and threatened, on his death-bed, to spout obscenities from his coffin if a clergyman were admitted to the house of mourning. His widow accordingly asked two of his Socialist friends to address the assemblage. Unluckily, both of them were in their cups, and their harangues, in consequence, were very painful. One of them traced the career of Karl Marx in immense detail; the other, after first denouncing Dr. Coolidge, read half a dozen cantos of dreadful poetry out of the Freethinker. The third funeral was conducted by the Freemasons, who came in plug hats and with white aprons over their cow-catchers. Their burial service was long, and full of pseudo-theological fustian. As for me, I'd rather have been planted by a Swedenborgian, whiskers and all. Or even by a mullah of the Ethical Culture Society.

What is needed, and what I bawl for politely, is a service that is free from the pious but unsupported asseverations that revolt so many of our best minds, and yet happily graceful and consoling. It will be very hard, I grant you, to concoct anything as beautiful as the dithyrambs in the Book of Common Prayer. Who wrote them originally I don't know, but whoever did it was a poet. They put the highly improbable into amazingly luscious words, and the palpably not-true into words even more caressing and disarming. It is impossible to listen to them, when they are intoned by a High Church rector of sepulchral gifts, without harboring a sneaking wish that, by some transcendental magic, they could throw off their poetical character and take on the dignity and reliability of prose—in other words, that the departed could be actually imagined as leaping out of the grave on the Last Morn, his split colloids all restored to their pristine complexity, his clothes neatly scoured and pressed, and every molecule of him thrilling with a wild surmise. I have felt this wish at the funerals of many virtuous and earnest brethren, whose sole sin was their refusal to swallow such anecdotes as the one in II Kings 11, 23-24. It seems a pity that men of that sort should be doomed to Hell, and it seems an even greater pity that they should be laid away to the banal chin-music of humorless Freemasons and stewed Socialists.

But, so far as I know, no suitable last rites for them have ever been drawn up. Between the service in the Book of Common Prayer (and its analogues, nearly all of them greatly inferior) and the maudlin mortuary dialogues of the Freemasons, Ku Kluxers, Knights of Pythias and other such fops to beauty there is absolutely nothing. Even the professional agnostics, who are violently literary, have never produced anything worthy to be considered: their best is indistinguishable from the text of a flag-drill or high-school pageant. Thus the average American skeptic, when his time comes to return to earth, is commonly knocked off with what, considering his prejudices, may be best described as a razzing. His widow, disinclined to risk scandal by burying him without any ceremonies at all, calls in the nearest clergyman, and the result is a lamentable comedy, creditable neither to honest faith nor to honest doubt. More than once, in attendance upon such an affair, I have observed a sardonic glitter in the eye of the pastor, especially when he came to the unequivocal statement that the deceased would infallibly rise again. Did he secretly doubt it? Or was he poking fun at a dead opponent, now persuaded of the truth of revelation at last? In either case there was something unpleasant in the spectacle. A suitable funeral service for doubters, full of lovely poetry but devoid of any specific pronouncement on the subject of a future life, would make such unpleasantness unnecessary.

We have the poets for the job, and I incline to suspect that their private theological ideas fit them for it. Skepticism, in fact, runs with their trade. Most Americans, as everyone knows, give their ecclesiastical affiliations in "Who's Who in America"—especially Congressmen, pedagogues, bank presidents and uplifters. But not the poets. The sole exception, so far as I can make out, is Vachel Lindsay, who reports that he is a member of the "Christian (Disciples) Church," a powerful sect in the No-More-Scrub-Bulls Belt. Even Edgar Albert Guest is silent on the subject, though he mentions the fact that he is a 33° Mason. Frost, George Sterling, Robinson, Sandburg and Masters keep suspiciously mum. I suggest that they meet in some quiet saloon and draw up the ritual I advocate. Let Masters be chairman of the committee: he is a lawyer as well as a poet, and may be trusted to keep within the statutes. And let Sterling be the boss consultor.

II

There is some need, too, for a marriage service for the damned, and at different times attempts have been made to supply it. But all such works seem to emanate from Radicals showing a characteristic lack of humor—and humor is as necessary to a marriage service as poetry is to a funeral service: a fact that the astute authors of the Book of Common Prayer did not overlook. However, the need here is not pressing, for in most American States civil marriage is sufficient, and heretics may be safely united without going before a rhetorician at all. Court clerks and police magistrates perform the job, mumbling unintelligibly out of a mysterious book, perhaps only a stolen Gideon Bible, hollowed to hold cigarettes. The main thing is to pay the fee. Marriages after midnight cost double, and if the bridegroom has the fumes of wine in his head he is apt to lose his watch as well as his liberty.

There are, as I say, marriage services drawn up by antinomians for the use of unbelievers, but they are full of distressing defects. Their lack of humor I have mentioned. Still worse, they are full of indignation—against the promise to obey, against the common theory that a wife is bound to give some supervision to her husband's household, against the convention that she shall adopt his surname. It is hard to give serious attention to such grim notions at a time immemorably viewed as festive and jocose. One hears frequently of wedding guests getting tight: not long ago a Methodist pastor in Missouri was protesting against it publicly. But when they are drawn into sociological controversy it is too much. Such revolutionary wedding services, in point of fact, have never gained much popularity. Now and then a pair of Socialists resorts to one, but even Socialists appear to prefer the harsh, mechanical offices of a court clerk.

Nor is there any active demand for a non-theological christening service. I am constantly amazed, as a bachelor, by the number of children growing up, in these iconoclastic modern days, without any formal naming at all. Not only do heretics spurn the ceremony; even professing Christians often neglect it. In my own nonage practically all babies, at least of the more respectable tribes of the race, were christened. There was a general feeling that failing to put them through was, in some obscure way, a tort against them—that it would bring them bad luck, and perhaps lead to legal difficulties in after life. It is so believed to this day nearly everywhere in Europe, and for sound reasons. Whenever a citizen in those decaying lands comes into contact with the state, which is very often, its agents demand his baptismal certificate as well as his birth certificate. So far, the imbeciles at Washington have not come to that, but it must be plain that they will come to it soon or late, and when the time is finally upon us there will be trouble for all those Americanos whose naming is now trusted to acclamation. They will have to dig up senile aunts and uncles, and produce affidavits that they were known to everyone as so-and-so at some date far in the past, just as they now have to get such affidavits, more often than not, when they want passports. The bureaucracy grinds slowly, but it grinds exceedingly fine. Recruited from the mentally deficient, it runs to circular insanities. Let it be proved tomorrow that some John Doe, suspected of favoring the recognition of Russia, was actually baptized Johannes, and it will be sufficient excuse for requiring all of us to prove that we are legally entitled to the names we sign to checks.

III

But all these are side issues. The main thing is that the poets, though most of them seem to have departed from the precincts and protection of Holy Church and her schismatic colonies—since when has a first-rate American poet written a hymn?—have failed, so far, to rise to the occasion when, even among heretics, poets are most pressingly needed. I have suggested that they meet in one of their temples and remedy the lack gloriously, but I don't insist, of course, that their service for the doubting dead be wholly original. The authors of the Book of Common Prayer, though they were poets of great talent, certainly did not trust only to their private inspiration. They borrowed copiously from the old missals, and they borrowed, too, directly from Holy Writ. What they concocted finally was a composite, but it was very discreetly and delicately put together, and remains impregnable to this day, despite many furious efforts to embellish and undo it.

All I propose is that the committee of poets imitate them, but with an avoidance of strophes objectionable in doctrine. Isn't there material enough in the books? There is enough, and to spare. I point to the works of Walt Whitman, now at last passing freely through the mails—to those parts, of course, of a non-erotic and non-political nature. I point to certain memorable stanzas of William Cullen Bryant. I point to Blake, Tennyson, Milton, Shelley, Keats, even Swinburne: what gaudy stuff for the purpose is in "Ave Atque Vale," "Tristram of Lyonesse" and "Atlanta in Calydon!" There is here a sweet soothing, a healing reassurance, a divine booziness—in brief, all the stuff of A No. 1 poetry. It would bring comfort, I believe, to many a poor widow who now groans as the Freemasons intone their balderdash or blushes as a Socialist orator criticises Omnipotence for permitting stock dividends—it would bring her a great deal more comfort, certainly, than the positive statement, made defiantly by the unwilling rector of the parish, that her departed John, having been colloidal and imperfect, has now become gaseous and immortal. Such a libretto for the unescapable last act would be humane and valuable. I renew my suggestion that the poets fall upon it at once.

THE MAN OF THE FAMILY

BY RUTH SUCKOW

FLOYD OBERHOLZER was just opening up the drug-store when Gerald came.

"Hello, Gerald. Want something?"

"I come to start in working."

"This morning!" Floyd was startled.

"Why, school can't be over yet, is it? What is this—Wednesday?"

"Yes, but we got done with our tests yesterday, all but arithmetic, and I didn't have to take that."

"Oh, you didn't have to take that?"

Floyd repeated vaguely. "Well, you come into the store and we'll see what there is for you to do."

Gerald followed him into the drug-store.

Floyd looked around somewhat helplessly. It was only a few months since he and Lois had bought this little business in Independenceville. They knew what to do themselves, but it was a different matter setting someone else to work. They hadn't expected Gerald so soon, or wanted him. Two or three months ago, he had come into the store to ask if he couldn't have a job, and because they hated to turn the kid away—it wasn't very long after the accident in which his father had been killed—Floyd had told him: "Well, you come around when school's out. Maybe we can find something then." And now he was here.

"Well, you're starting in early," Floyd said to him. "You've beat my wife—she isn't in the store yet. Well, I don't know, Gerald—I guess you might as well sweep out, the first thing." He remembered then that Lois had swept the store before they closed last night; the boys had left so many cigarette stubs around. But he guessed it could stand it again. It would keep Gerald busy while Floyd decided what to have him do.

"All right," Gerald answered soberly.

"Where do you keep your broom?"

"Right out there in the back, Gerald. See—I'll show you. Then you'll know where it is."

Gerald started in to sweep the wooden floor with awkward, scowling concentration. His back was stooped and intent. He took long hard strokes, trying to do a good job of it. Floyd looked at him, and then turned and went scuttling up the stairs.

"Hey—Lois!" he called softly.

"Smatter, pop?"

Lois, still in her bungalow apron, came to the door of the kitchen. The Oberholzers were living over the drug-store.

"Say, that kid's here."

"What kid?"

"Gerald Rayburn. He's come to start in working. Seems awful anxious to begin. What in the dickens shall I have him do?"

"You're a fine boss!" Lois began to laugh. "What's he doing now—standing in the middle of the floor and sucking his thumb?"

"I've got him sweeping."

"Why, I swept last night, you idiot!"

"Well, I know you did, but I forgot it. I didn't want to tell him to stand around. He goes at it like a little beaver. You ought to watch him. Oh, I suppose the kid is anxious to start in earning."

Lois didn't know what to say.

"You come down," said Floyd, "and tell him about the soda-fountain. That's your end of the business."

"Oh, it is, is it? All right, I'll come down and give the boss's orders since he doesn't know what they are himself," she replied with mock commiseration, and pinched Floyd's ear.

"Well, gosh, I didn't expect that kid the minute school let out! Most kids aren't that anxious to go to work. Isn't this the day they have the school picnic? Why, sure—that's why we got that pop."

He started down the stairs and then went back to the next-to-the-top step and stood frowning uncertainly.

"Think we can really use him, Lois?"

"Well, I guess we've got him, anyway!"

"I know we'll have to have somebody, but he's such a kid. I don't know—"

Lois said hastily: "Oh well, let's try him. You told him he could come. I feel so sorry for that family."

"Well, so do I. But then . . . Well, all right. . . ."

Floyd left it at that, and scuttled down the stairs again. Lois went back to the kitchen which she herself had painted blue and white, with figured curtains, changing it from the gloomy old hole that the Tewkesburys had left it, to a gay new room. She hated to leave this beloved little place to go and help Floyd in the store. Now that they had hired just a little boy to help them for the Summer, she supposed she would have to be downstairs most of the time. She almost wished she hadn't told Floyd to keep Gerald. Well, if Gerald couldn't do the work, he'd have to go, that was all.

"All right, Gerald," Floyd went into the store saying loudly and cheerfully. "Finished that? Well, then, I guess you'd better—" His eyes, quickly roving, caught sight of the magazine rack. "I guess you'd better straighten up those magazines. Folks take 'em out and read 'em all through and then put 'em back."

"All right."

Floyd whistled as he took the long gray cambric covers off the tables in the middle of the room, where boxes of gilt-edged correspondence cards and leather-bound copies of the works of Edgar Guest had to be displayed until the graduating exercises were over. Gerald went at his work with such silent concentration that it almost embarrassed Floyd.

"What do you want I should do next?"

"Oh, well . . . Guess maybe I better show you about these cigarettes and tobacco. That's probably what they'll be after first. I'll show you how we've got things marked."

"All right."

Lois came down. Floyd gave her an expressive look and nodded toward Gerald. "He's right at it!" Certainly the boy seemed to be trying hard. His freckled face with the crop of red hair was surly with concentration. Floyd couldn't help remembering that he was just a kid and too young to be starting in to work in earnest. He was quite willing to give up his charge and let Lois initiate him into the mysteries of the new white soda-fountain which they had installed in place of the cracked, lugubrious onyx splendor of an earlier day. Gerald stood silently beside Lois, bashfully aware of her bobbed hair and her plump white arms, answering dutifully: "Yes, ma'am."

"You can watch me this morning, Gerald, and run some errands, maybe. Wash up the glasses. Do the dirty work—how's that?"

"Yes, ma'am."

He was a little clumsy, partly out of bashfulness, but so serious and determined that Lois thought: "Goodness, I wonder if it'll last!" She wanted to give him all the help he needed, but she didn't quite know what to make of his surly little face. He hated to ask her questions, and several times she had to say, "Oh, not like that, Gerald!"

II

"Gee, that was an awful thing to happen to that family!" Floyd said to Lois in the back room of the store, where he had gone to look for a special package of hog medicine ordered by old Gus Reinbeck. "I think this kid kind of realizes, don't you?"

"Have they got anything, do you suppose?"

"A little insurance, they say, and that house, but not much more than to keep them until this boy can start earning."

"The mother can earn something herself, I should think," Lois said rather defiantly. She worked.

"Yes, but with three kids to look after. . . . And anyway, what is there for a woman to do in a burg like this except take in washing?"

"Well, maybe."

Back door and front of the store were open, and through the shimmery blackness of the back screen the garden was green and fresh. A tin cup hung on an old-fashioned pump under the vines. Gerald looked longingly at the boards of the platform, wet with spilled water. There was city water in the soda-fountain, but the pump looked so much cooler out there. "Run out and get a drink if you want to, Gerald," Lois told him. "I always go out there for my water. It's fun to work the pump." Boys never could see a pump or a drinking fountain or even a hydrant without being consumed with thirst, she knew. Lois liked boys. Gerald made her think of her kid brother. It was a shame he had to go to work. She wanted to reassure him somehow, to rumple his red hair or pat his shoulder. But she must remember that they were hiring him. They couldn't afford to keep him out of pity. Beside, he seemed determined to evade all personal advances and stuck doggedly to work. Maybe the kid was miserable at missing that picnic.

It was getting hot in town. Cars began to rattle and whirl down the street, and in a few moments Louie Grossman's big red truck drove up to the side door of the drug-store.

"Hey, Floyd! Got the pop?"

"Got the pop? You bet I've got the pop. You want it now?"

"Sure do, if it's goin' on this picnic."

"All right, sir! Want to come and help me take it out, Gerald?"

"All right."

Gerald went with Floyd into the back room of the store, bright and cool and scattered with light from the green leaves outside. He tugged at one end of the big pop case, and helped Floyd carry it outside and shove it into the truck.

"Now, another one, Gerald."

"All right."

"Well, the kids oughtn't to get thirsty today," Floyd said.

"No, they sure got plenty. What are you doing, Gerald?" Louie asked. "Ain't you going to the picnic?"

"I got to work," Gerald answered.

He went back into the store. The two men looked after him.

"He workin' for you now, Floyd?"

"Guess so. It looks like it. He came this morning."

"Goes at it pretty good, don't he?"

"Yes, he seems to be willing. He's pretty young, but then . . . Where they going for the picnic today, Louie?"

"Out to Bailey's Creek. You ever been there?"

"Not yet. Mighty pretty place, I guess," he added.

"Yes, but it ain't much of a road."

"Well, don't tip 'em out, Louie."

"No, I'll try and keep the old bus in her tracks."

Louie started the noisy engine of the big truck. It went roaring up the street between green lawns and white houses and pink peonies, to where the school children, boys in freshly ironed blouses and girls in summery dresses, waited in a flock under the elms of the school-yard . . . then out, spinning down the graveled highway between freshly planted fields, turning into the little woods road, narrow and rutted, where the children had to bend their heads under the switch of honey locusts that left small white petals in their sun-warmed hair . . . on into the depths of green woods through the heart of which the shining creek was flowing . . .

Lois had come to the doorway to watch the truck leave.

"I wouldn't mind going to a picnic myself on a day like this," she murmured.

When she went back into the store, she looked curiously at Gerald. It gave her a guilty feeling, wholly unreasonable, to have him at work in their store today when it was a holiday for all the other children. But he had come of his own accord. They hadn't told him to do it.

"Did your sisters go on the picnic, Gerald?" she asked.

"Yes, they went," he answered, rather slightly.

"How many have you, Gerald? Just Juanita and Betty?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"And you're the only boy?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"You could have started in tomorrow just as well, Gerald."

He did not answer.

III

The bright morning grew hotter and hotter, until to enter the drug-store from the glaring cement outside was like going into a cool, clean-scented cavern. The regular set of loafers drifted in, asked for tobacco, and stayed, sitting on the white-topped stools at the soda fountain and trying to be facetious with Gerald. "Well, you got a new clerk?" everyone who came in demanded. It was a new joke every time. In an interval of no customers, Lois stooped down and drew out a pale green bottle frosted over with cold moisture from the case under the counter. It was still a treat to her to think she owned a store.

"I'm going to try some of this new lime stuff," she said. "See how it tastes. Don't you want the other straw, Gerald?"

"No, I guess not," he answered bashfully.

There was a glint of longing and reluctance in his eyes. But Lois thought: Maybe I oughtn't to start offering him things and being too easy with him. After all, Floyd was paying him to help them, and it wasn't her fault that his father had been killed. They were doing the best they could for him by letting him have a job. When, later, she decided to try one of those chocolates Floyd had ordered from a new traveling man, she turned her back while she nibbled it and wiped her fingers on the scrap of oiled paper in which it had been wrapped. Running the business all by themselves was still an adventure to the young Oberholzers; but even now they had run up against the fact more than once that it wasn't just a game. They had halfway discovered the meaning of that term—"If you want to do business——" Lois couldn't pick out from the traveling man's stock the delicately scented toilet waters that she herself liked, but had to choose the red and green brands with big gaudy flowers on the labels that the girls here in town would buy—the kind that "went." She had had to freeze out old Bart Bailey who came in every morning to read the paper and the detective magazines he had no money to buy, and left dirty thumb marks on all the pages.

Noon came with the shriek of the whistle from the power-house, with the noise of cars being started and of the men driving home to dinner.

"When does your mamma expect you home for dinner, Gerald?" Lois asked.

"Oh, I guess it don't matter," Gerald mumbled bashfully.

"Didn't you tell her when you'd come?"

"No, ma'am."

They let him go; but if they kept him in the store, he would have to go later and let them have their dinner at noon. That was one reason why they wanted help. He was back in good time. "Well, didn't take you long to eat your dinner!" Floyd said. But maybe it wasn't a good thing to act surprised at his promptness. It would wear off soon enough, if they could infer anything from their experiences with Marcelle Johnston, who had pretended to work for them for three weeks in the Winter.

At intervals during the afternoon, Floyd and Lois reported to each other. "We're going to have an awful time teaching him to make a decent sundae. He doesn't catch on any too fast, but he seems to be willing to do whatever you tell him." Whether they wanted to keep him or no, it was evident that he meant to stay. He wanted the job. His surly little freckled face scarcely relaxed into a smile even when there was a dog fight outside and Miss Angie Robinson's little poodle sent that big hound of Ole Swanson's off yelping. He went at whatever he was told to do with dogged earnestness, although he didn't see things for himself. He said "Yes, ma'am" with sober respect; but he would ask: "What's the price of this here kind of tobacco, Lois?" and say to customers: "No, Floyd ain't in just now, he went over to the depot." As the afternoon wore along, his freckled face grew flushed. "Does it seem like a long day, Gerald?" Lois asked him once. He admitted: "Kind of. Not so very."

Late in the afternoon, the picnic trucks came rattling into town with all the children disheveled and shouting. A few moments afterwards, a group of girls came bursting into the store. Their bright-colored Summer dresses were wrinkled, their bobs were wildly rumpled, their tired eyes were shining.

"Oh gee, but we're thirsty! We're just dying! Oh, look at Gerald Rayburn! Are you working in here, Gerald?"

"Yes, didn't you know he was?" his young sister Juanita asked. "We want six bottles of pop, Gerald," she ordered airily.

"Have you got any money?"

"Yes, I have!"

"Where'd you get it then?" he demanded suspiciously.

"None of your business, Mr. Smarty! I guess it's not yours, is it?"

A bright pink flared up in Juanita's cheeks. Her eyes sparkled angrily. She was a pretty child, with red hair, like Gerald's, blazing out in a fuzzy aureole around her freckled face. She flounced down into one of the white chairs. "We want a table, don't we, kids? We don't want to sit at the fountain, like the boys." When Gerald brought the six cold red bottles carefully toppling on the tray, she lifted her little chin and disdained to look at him.

"You needn't think because I'm working here, you can come in and order what you want," he told her.

"Shut up!" she whispered furiously.

Her eyes were brighter still with tears. Mamma had given her the nickel for helping with the ironing yesterday afternoon instead of going off with the girls. She had given it to her for ironing Julie Bronson's pink chemise, with all the lace, so beautifully. It was none of Gerald's business what she did with it! She said to the other girls, with flashing eyes and quivering lips:

"He thinks he's so smart now just because he's starting in to work and Betty and I aren't. You'd just think he owned us to hear the way he talks. I don't care. I guess he isn't the only one who does anything. I guess I do lots of things. I'd like to see Gerald Rayburn ever wash the dishes!"

She stuck two straws into her bottle of strawberry pop and sucked it all up defiantly. Maybe she ought to have saved her nickel, but Gerald had no right trying to boss her in front of all the girls.

He told her, when she was leaving the store:

"You needn't go running around now, you can go home and help mamma."

"You keep still!" She threw her nickel down with a ring on the white counter of the soda fountain. "I guess you aren't my boss yet!"

"That's all right, I know what I'm talking about."

"That's right, Gerald," old Hod Brumskill shouted, with humorous approval. "You make the womenfolks mind you. Ain't that so, boys?"

"You tell 'em it's so!"

They laughed loudly; and then, clustered together with their arms on the glass counter, that had a sign in red letters "Do not lean!"', they tore open their packages of bitter-scented tobacco and began to talk in lowered voices about the Rayburn family: how it had been "left," how it got along, about the tragic death of Frank Rayburn, still disputing over the minutiae of that event which they had never yet been able to settle, although nearly a year had passed since the thing happened. "Well, I never could understand how a fella like that, that was used to climbin' all over everywhere, come to fall off that ladder like that——." "Why, he just kinda stepped backward-like—I s'pose he forgot maybe where he was at——." "Some says the ladder broke and let him down." "Naw, the ladder didn't break." "Well, was it true he'd been out drinkin' the night before? That's how I heard it." "Naw, he hadn't been out drinkin' the night before." "Well, I can't figger out——." "Why, he just kinda stepped backwards——" It was terrible, they all agreed with solemn faces, to think that poor little woman should have been left with those three children, although there was dispute again about how much they had been left with. Some said they "had something," some said they "had nothing". She was a nice woman. Yes, and she was a good-looking woman, too . . . And then they drew closer together, and one of them said something about "Art Fox," and their voices broke into a laugh and a snicker.

Gerald was washing glasses at the soda-fountain. His freckled face flushed a dull red, and when they snickered he looked over ^{at} them furiously. He had a notion of what they were saying. When they passed him, leaving the store, they praised him loudly and self-consciously.

"Well, Gerald, you're all right, ain't you? Takin' right a-hold!"

"You bet he's all right."

"Well, Gerald's the man now, ain't that so, Gerald! He's the one."

"That's right."

The six o'clock whistle blew.

Gerald looked about hesitatingly for Floyd. Finally he went out to the back room of the store to find him.

"Shall I go now? The whistle blew."

"Yes, sure, you go along now, Gerald. I wasn't paying any attention."

Floyd was busy over some boxes on the floor. Gerald hesitated. His face was red. He wanted to ask if he had "done all right." But he was ashamed. Finally he blurted:

"Do you want I should come back to-morrow morning?"

Floyd was still busy over the boxes. Gerald waited.

"Yes, you come back in the morning, Gerald," Floyd answered cheerfully.

IV

Gerald got out of the store as fast as he could. How bright the street seemed outside, and how fresh the air was! He felt as if he had been smelling camphor and perfumes all his life. He had a job! It seemed to him that everyone must know. He wanted people to ask him what he had been doing, it made him feel proud and important; although when Mr. Baird, the minister, who had been in the store earlier in the day, greeted him with: "Well, is the day's work over, young man?" he was suddenly too bashful to do more than grunt in answer. He walked soberly down the main street, and broke into a run as he cut across the corner.

His feet burned. It was hard to stand all day like that, although he had told Lois he didn't mind it. He grew hot all over when he thought of the mistakes he had made. But the ache that had seemed lodged in his chest somewhere, ever since the day when his father was buried and all the relatives had all told him: "Well, you'll have to look after your mamma now, Gerald, won't you?"—when his mother cried and clung to him that night—that ache was strangely eased. He was earning money. He could take care of his mother. It humiliated him that his mother should have to be doing the washing for other people, although it was only some of their neighbors; but she wouldn't have to do it always. He had not heard more than a few words of what those men in the drug-store were saying. But at the thought—the very suspicion of it—his mind felt hot and sore. If they'd been saying anything about his mother, they'd be sorry for it. He'd—he didn't know just what—but anyway, they'd better look out!

The new little semi-bungalow house looked bleak and desolate. It had been that way ever since his father died. No new flowers had been planted this Spring, the clothes-line hadn't been fixed, the garage for the car they had been going to get this Summer stood unpainted just as his father had left it last Fall. But they would have things again. The relatives needn't say anything; he guessed he could take care of his own mother without their telling him. He loved her, but it was none of their business to know it.

She was standing in the doorway. Gerald evaded her kiss, ducked away from her and went tramping out to the kitchen. He was afraid she was going to make a fuss.

"I gotta wash my hands," he told her importantly.

She followed him and stood looking at him, pitiful and proud.

"Why don't you go up to the bathroom, sweetheart?"

"I druther wash down here."

It was what his father had done when he came home from work.

"Are you ready for supper?" she pleaded.

"You bet."

She touched his face, he couldn't avoid that. But he got into the dining-room as fast as he could and sat down with satisfaction. There were all the things that he liked—hot biscuits, and jelly, and strawberries. He demanded coffee, and his mother gave it to him. Betty's little mouth puckered up and her eyes were round with amazement.

"You don't let us have coffee," she said.

"Well, brother's been working. He has to have it."

The two little girls chattered eagerly about the school picnic. Gerald stuck to the business of eating. He had never been so hungry; hot biscuits had never tasted so good. He replied briefly to his mother's fond questions about what he had been doing all day.

"Were Floyd and his wife good to you? Did they show you what to do?"

"Yeah, they were all right."

"Did you know how to wait on people?"

"Sure."

"Didn't it seem terribly long to you?"

"Naw."

"Well, you want to eat a good supper."

It was over now, and he didn't want to talk about it. He wished she'd let him alone.

The one cookie left on the plate was given to Gerald. Betty followed her mother into the kitchen, weeping and complaining. She was the baby, and the extra pieces of everything were for her.

"I don't see why you gave it to Gerald, mamma. You didn't even make him give me half."

"Well, darling, listen—when men have been working they get hungrier than women and little girls do, and then we have to let them have what they want to eat. We don't get so hungry."

"I was hungry!"

"Were you, pet?" Her mother laughed, half commiseratingly. "Then you eat this strawberry mamma puts into your little mouth."

"I don't want a strawberry. I had enough strawberries. And I was working," Betty insisted. "I put on all the knives and forks. I was working, mamma."

"Were you? Well, you were helping. You're a nice little helper."

"Before I'd make a fuss about an old cooky!" Juanita said scornfully.

She flashed a quick indignant glance at Gerald, remembering how he had talked to her in the drug-store. Let him have everything in the house to eat if he wanted it, and if mamma wanted to give it to him. But there was an obscure justice that silenced her even while it made her resentful. Well, she wouldn't be here all her life. She'd get married some day—and then she'd do as she pleased.

Gerald went out and sat on the steps of the porch. This was the time of day when his father always used to come out here and look at the paper. Gerald was ashamed of having eaten the cooky. He thought it belonged to him, but let that baby Betty have it! He would after this. He didn't know when he had had such a good supper. He watched Bobbie Parker's yard across the street so that he could shout across at Bobby the instant he came outdoors. Maybe they could go over and see those turtles Bobbie's uncle had in his back-yard. It would be fun to see if they could really be taught tricks. He could hear the girls complaining about the dishes. "It's your turn tonight." "It isn't!" Gee whizz, if they couldn't even do a little thing like washing dishes!

The evening came on cool and bright. Gerald stayed on the porch steps, although Bobby didn't appear in the yard. What he had really meant to do was to ask Bobby about the picnic, and try to find out, without saying it in so many words, whether any other boy had hung around Arlene Fedderson. He didn't care, anyway. He had thought about it in the store all the time, but it didn't matter so much now. His mother was the one he had to look after. Again he felt a fine, tired glow of satisfaction. He had put in a good day's work, all right.

Then he blushed. He remembered those men at the drug-store. Here was that old Art Fox coming up the walk with a pailful of strawberries! Well, if he thought he was coming here with those berries, he could just go away again.

"H'lo, Gerald," Art Fox called out cheerfully. He was a good-natured man, a widower, with a red sunburned face and grayish hair and mustache. He lived about a block away from the Rayburns, in a good-sized house. Gerald had always thought he was a nice man, because he never said any more than "'Lo, boys!" when the boys ran across his lawn playing run-sheep-run.

"H'lo," Gerald answered briefly.

"Your ma around anywhere?"

"I don't know."

Art Fox halted. "Oh, well. . . . She aint gone out anywhere, has she?"

"I guess she has."

What did it matter whether that was true or not? Art Fox had no business coming here. He felt a sense of pain and outrage.

"That's too bad. I thought I'd drop around and see if you folks couldn't use a few strawberries. I got a bunch of 'em ripe—too many for an old fellow to eat by himself," he added with a mild attempt at jocular. "Didn't know as you folks had any."

"We got some."

"That so? Well, I guess you can use a few more, can't you?"

"No, we got all we want."

"That so? Well, if you got all you need . . ." Art Fox stood there awkwardly for a moment. "Well, I guess I'll have to try to dump these on somebody else."

Gerald was silent.

"Your ma be home pretty soon, will she?"

"No, she aint here."

"That so? Well . . . goodbye, then."

Gerald said nothing. He could feel his heart thumping. He looked away. Art Fox was going down the walk with the strawberries newly washed and freshly red in the bright tin pail. Just as he turned the corner, Mrs. Rayburn came to the door.

"I thought I heard somebody. Have they gone? Was anybody here, Gerald?"

"Art Fox." Gerald did not turn around.

"Oh!" His mother seemed a little flustered. "What did he want? Has he gone away?" she asked.

"He brought some of his strawberries."

"Why, Gerald, why didn't you call me?"

"'Cause I told him we didn't want 'em. We got some of our own."

"Why, Gerald—"

"Well, we don't want him around here," Gerald said roughly.

He stared straight ahead at a little bird hopping about on the lawn, fighting down the childish tears that made his throat ache and his eyes burn. That sense of pain and outrage swelled in his heart. He thought of the unfinished garage standing bare and desolate in the back-yard—his father's old coat still hanging in the kitchen entry. If his mother couldn't take care of herself, he'd do it for her. He was the man of the house now. Art Fox could stay at home where he belonged. This was their home. She was his mother. Above that ache of unmanly tears he felt a hard exultance. They wouldn't laugh any more in the drug-store. They wouldn't talk about her.

She looked flushed and disconcerted. She stood in the doorway looking at Gerald. The back of his red head was like his father's. So was the set of his sturdy shoulders. She looked at them with an unwilling respect that turned slowly to resentment. All these last few weeks, a secret girlish pleasure had been growing up in her heart most surprisingly out of the blackness of her grief and loneliness. She knew that she was admired. She had thought it hidden from everyone. At times she had laughed and called herself a fool; and at times her eyes were dreamy and a warmth settled softly about her. Now it was shamed and trampled. . . .

She started to say something to Gerald. But she stopped, as she had always stopped with Frank. She felt her anger melting helplessly away from her. He was so proud of working for her. He was so proud of his strength. He was only a little boy, after all—her little boy, sitting small and pitiful and unapproachable in the twilight.

She turned, her face suddenly quivering, went back into the hot darkness of the empty house, and sat down there alone.

HUMAN progress in Sacramento, as reported by the Associated Press:

From bank robber to chiropractor is the road of reformation William Crumm is traveling at the State highway prison camp near Crescent City. This road camp in the redwood country, in common with any modern community of prisoners, has its convict-students of scenario writing and other subjects; but Crumm, who was sentenced for robbing a bank at Woodland, is ahead of most of his contemporaries in that he already has made much of the office equipment he will need when he begins the practice of his chosen profession. He has transformed the steel cot on which he sleeps into a sort of combination bed and operating table, using the frame of the bed as a chassis for the backbone stretching machinery he built with the aid of the camp blacksmith's forge. The harness in which the patient's head and feet are to be encased while being drawn in opposite directions by Crumm's block-and-tackle device was made of odds and ends of rope and a pair of shoes. He says the machine will add six inches to a man's height by encouraging expansion of the vertebrae.

GEORGIA

REPORT of a lamentable atrocity in the eminent Tifton Daily Gazette, the leading cultural organ between the Flint and Allapaha rivers:

Probably one of the dirtiest pieces of politics perpetrated in the present campaign was the attempt to accuse Editor W. R. Frier, of Douglas, candidate for Public Service Commissioner, of being a Republican. Mr. Frier promptly nailed the report as a lie, and submits his record and the endorsements of his home folks as proof of his life-long service in the ranks of Democracy, citing the fact that he has served as chairman of the Coffee County Democratic Executive Committee for three terms and also as member of the State Committee.

EXULTANT gloat of the distinguished Macon Telegraph:

The election of H. L. MacEwen of Macon to the presidency of the Georgia Association of Civitan Clubs gives to this city a distinction that perhaps no other in the Southeast has had. Macon has had at least two district governors of Rotary; a district governor of the Kiwanis Clubs; two district governors of Lions Clubs; the district governor of the Exchange Club; the district governor of the Palladium Club, and now the district governor of the Civitan Clubs.

THE thrilling story of an Augusta Rotarian, as related by the Chronicle of that world-famed town:

Mr. Virgil Hollingsworth started off by saying that 20 years ago he dreamed a dream so ambitious that he dared not confide it to a soul for fear of being ridiculed. This dream, Mr. Hollingsworth said, was a passionate desire to create confectionery that would be so perfectly made that there would be no jarring note, no equivocation with perfection but as pleasing to the taste as poetry and music are to the ear. Seven years ago, in a talk, Mr. Hollingsworth informed the Rotarians that he had perfected Unusual Candies—his dream was realized.

The speaker at this point paid a tribute to Bob Lewis of Gardelle's, Mr. Lewis' firm being the first agency to handle the Hollingsworth candies. He paid his respects to the members of the Rotary Club, who, he said, gave him every encouragement to continue on with his work. The speaker then related the days when they went out to sell candy, stating that the druggist informed his salesmen that they knew the candy was good, but to the public it was not known of. These were the dark days, Mr. Hollingsworth said. He said that he remembered the many warnings that the candy field was impossible—that you could count the successes in this field on one hand. He said that he asked of himself "Shall I go on? Can I go on? How much would it cost to stop now?" For the lack of customers, the speaker said, he saw his life's ambition fading away. He said that the firm then turned to advertising, as a means of putting their goods before the public, spending every dollar they could in this way without going into debt. The speaker said that their sales began to increase and that they finished that year with about two per cent profits. The speaker said that since then the firm has gone forward each year until today Hollingsworth's Unusual Candy is the leading seller over a large area. Mr. Hollingsworth said that his firm today employs 24 salesmen and from two to three hundred people in their manufacturing plant. Mr. Hollingsworth was heartily congratulated by the Rotarians for his interesting talk, following the meeting.

Flesh-colored or extremely thin hose are not permitted. The wearing of jewelry for ornamentation is prohibited.

ILLINOIS

STATISTICS gathered by a learned reader of the Chicago Tribune:

This afternoon from five to six-thirty I parked my car directly underneath the L steps at the south-east corner of University and Sixty-third streets, and made a survey of the clothes of the women and girls who came down the steps.

Of 167 women and girls who came down the steps in such a way that I could see their underclothes, fifty-eight, or over one-third of them, had no bloomers, underwear, or other tight fitting clothes on. Forty-seven of them wore some kind of clothes which were tight at the bottom and the balance, sixty-two of them, wore garments which were partially closed. My fiancée, who was with me at the time, classified the undergarments of this last group as step-ins, combinations and so forth, which were only partially tight at the bottom.

The women and girls covered by this investigation were better class office clerks and housewives home from shopping tours. They ranged from twelve or thirteen years old to over seventy, and seemingly the comparative nudity had nothing to do with their age.

God's Preference For Polka Dots

EXTRACT from a religious leaflet circulated in Chicago:

Shortly after I was saved, God healed me from pain in the head of ten years standing. . . . The pain was so intense one day at the shop that I said, "Lord, either heal me or have the boss let me go home." I felt something go through my whole body. Nearly four years now I've never had that pain any more. Had a boil on the ball of my foot, worked two hours that day, couldn't stand the pain. Doctor examined it and says, "Go home and stay about four days and come back and I will lance it." Went to my room and cried, shouted, praised the Lord and thanked Him for the boil. Told Him what the doctor said. "Now, Lord, please heal me, you know I don't want to stay in this room so long. I want to work. You promised to keep me well so I could get the gospel track." The next day I went back to work. Hallelujah, no pain.

Professor of Electricity, Chicago Univ., Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sir: I have taken sixty-five treatments of electricity for the Sciatica Rheumatism and have become overcharged with the same, and cannot get rid of it. For the last three years I have suffered from electric vibrations of all the parts of my body and it seems to grow stronger all the time.

I have purchased a medical electric battery and thought I might possibly use it with a ground wire to get rid of the surplus electricity. Will you kindly let me know what you would recommend for my case, and how best to use the battery. I am writing to you because I saw Prof. Loeb's name mentioned in a booklet that came with the battery.

If you know of any medical institution that makes a specialty of electrical treatments, I would be greatly obliged to learn of it. My rheumatism seems to be completely cured, so I do not need further treatment for that.

... The conclusion that one would naturally assume, is, thank God for the rural districts in the South, for there, as proven by this author, lies the hope of Fundamentalism and the teachings of Jesus Christ without blemish or without shame. If the general acceptance of the Bible and miracles of God comes from an unintelligent and unenlightened group of backward Southerners, then the South has more to be proud of than she ever dreamed! In this case we shout, "Thanks to ignorance, and glory be to God!" THE FLYNN

BY HARBOR ALLEN

LATE in the Summer of 1906 a reporter for the Philadelphia Public Ledger turned up Jasper street near the junction of Front and Dauphin. It was a hot Saturday night. News was scarce. The editor had sent him out for a feature story to fill the yawning columns. Stocky workers from the Kensington mills strolled up and down the street in creaking shoes. Women in Summer flounces that swished about their shoe-tops loitered before lighted store-windows. Nowhere was there any sign of a feature story.

Suddenly a tiny knot of people near the curb caught the reporter's eye. A man with a lugubrious voice stood on a collapsible platform bawling at the crowd. They paid no attention to him. The reporter stopped. "The rights of the working class. . . Socialism will solve . . . greedy, grasping capitalists . . .," he heard. He wasn't impressed. He didn't say "Bunk!" because the word hadn't been coined in those days; but he muttered its equivalent. Then the man with the lugubrious voice stepped down. The reporter thought he would stick around a while, anyway. Something might happen.

Something did. Up to the platform leaped a slim girl with blue eyes, soft brown hair parted in the middle, a wide-collared shirtwaist, and a flaming red tie. She couldn't have been over sixteen. The reporter moved closer. She was very pretty. Gravely she eyed the passers-by. Then she began to talk. The reporter reached for his wad of copy-paper. A yellow newspaper clipping, now twenty years old and much worn at the creases, still tells what he witnessed:

As she stood there, giving utterance to the doctrine of Socialism, men and women flocked toward her. Corner loungers deserted their favorite poles. Perpetual inebriates left their posts outside saloons. A band of noisy children grew still and approached the girl. She had hypnotized the crowd. Soon they were laughing when she laughed, frowning when she frowned, growing terribly earnest when she grew terribly earnest. She quoted from the works of great men who had defied the existing order. Marat she gave by the ell, Mirabeau by the inch, Byron, George Eliot, Tom Paine, and Maxim Gorky by the acre and the mile. She told how the average working-man in the United States is earning only $9 a week. She said: "The State should provide for the maintenance of every child, so that the individual woman shall not be compelled to depend for support upon the individual man while bearing children. The barter and sale that go under the name of love are highly obnoxious." The crowd dispersed slowly and thoughtfully. The perpetual inebriate forgot the swinging doors. The corner lounge stood straight. The rest went their way in thoughtful moods.

The reporter pocketed his notes and returned to the Ledger office. The story made the front page. The next day there were rewrites in the New York papers. And that is how Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Labor's Joan of Arc, first broke into print.

Twenty years later I met her for the first time. She was no longer a wisp of a girl. Her figure had assumed matronly proportions. Her face, still handsome in its frame of dark hair, was lined and a trifle weary. Many things had happened in those twenty years. The yellow clipping had been pasted in a book together with hundreds of other clippings. There were whole books full of clippings, in each of which the name Elizabeth Gurley Flynn figured prominently in the headlines. Often there were pictures of a girl in a broad sombrero, with an oval face, large frank eyes, and a lithe body. Many of the clippings expressed amazement at her youth, her beauty, the skill with which she led whole armies of battling workers. Some, less polite, referred to her as "the Flynn woman." They intimated that she was vulgar and shocking, that nice, respectable American girls didn't lead strikes and defy policemen. How often, in her day, Gurley Flynn has distressed an inland editor's sensibilities!

For during those twenty years this Irish girl from the Bronx has led twenty strikes and labor movements between New York and Seattle. She has been arrested fifteen times and has spent days and days in the jails of half a score of States. But not once has she ever been convicted of crime. She has wits that are too keen for that. But twice she has been kidnapped and at least half a dozen times driven from terror-stricken towns by police grown panicky at the very mention of her name. Even today the blue-coats of this great free Republic have no love for Gurley Flynn.

It was at a radical luncheon to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of her first speech that I met her. Men with lugubrious voices were speaking: perhaps among them the same man who twenty years before lured that Philadelphia reporter to his feature story. They spoke at great length with speech-hardened voices: capitalism, the rights of the working class, social legislation, the brutality of the New Jersey police. At last they called on Gurley Flynn.

"When I remember how seriously we people in the labor movement used to take ourselves!" she began—and then she told the story of her arrest with a group of wobblies in the West. Guarded by deputies with shotguns they were packed into a box-car and shipped across the State line: if not a legal, certainly an effective way of disposing of them. While passing through a stretch of majestic mountain peaks the girl turned toward the nearest wobbly, and pointing through the half-open door, remarked: "Just look at that lovely scenery, Bill." But Bill only grumbled: "Don't care to look at capitalist scenery."

The audience laughed. The stuffiness of the meeting was dispelled. Obviously, there was something to Gurley Flynn. Here, at last, was a labor agitator with a sense of humor!

II

She comes by that sense of humor and by her rebelliousness naturally. Paddy the Rebel, a Fenian who in 1798 joined the French expedition to Killalla, was one of her ancestors. Her mother's people were Gurleys, a family renowned for a wit which eventually went into the making of George Bernard Shaw. The Flynns left Ireland rather hastily after the English authorities, in a moment of extravagance, had placed prices on their heads. It appears that they had taken to poisoning the streams in which Irishmen were forbidden any longer to fish. They settled on an island off the coast of Maine, where, so the story goes, one of the women ran a bear out of the yard with her broom. Eventually, Thomas Flynn appeared upon the scene. He had worked his way through Dartmouth and become a civil engineer. After his marriage to the daughter of the Flynns he moved to Concord, N. H., where Elizabeth Gurley was born; then to Manchester, where he ran unsuccessfully for city engineer. Finally he became a Socialist and settled down in New York. Here he moved from one radical group to another until he became the local king-pin of the I. W. W.'s back in the early golden days when the words "One Big Union" spelled millennium. After organizing 10,000 New York laborers into twenty-eight locals, he saw other men, younger and shrewder, hornswoggle him out of his leadership. Disillusioned, he moved to New Jersey. "Every little radical," he now says, "has a movement of his own."

It was after Thomas Flynn had been defrauded out of a year's pay that Elizabeth Gurley turned to Socialism. She was fourteen years old and zealous. An essay that she wrote on education, submitted in a contest at the Morris High School, in the Bronx, caused almost as much consternation among the teachers as the dropping of a hand-grenade in the faculty-room. Her masterpiece rejected, she delivered it in front of the school building while the more ingratiating winner was declaiming within.

"Huh! What do you know about education?" demanded an unwary heckler.

"What don't I know!" flashed the speaker. "I'm getting educated."

About this time the leaders of the Socialist and Socialist-Labor parties were burying their hatchets for a series of joint open-air meetings on the corners of Broadway. Would Gurley Flynn speak for them? She would. At her first meeting she saw the opening speaker yanked from the platform and arrested. Immediately she leaped up and began in a torrent of words to tell what she thought of a city wherein an honest Irishman couldn't talk as he pleased. Together with her father she was escorted to the police station.

"Do you expect to convert people to Socialism by talking to them on the corners of Broadway?" asked the magistrate.

"They listened to me, didn't they?" the girl replied.

The magistrate sighed in pity.

"Dismissed!" he said.

Thomas Flynn has never been arrested since. But for Gurley Flynn it was only a beginning. She was always in demand as a speaker after this. Her lithe little figure, her flaming red tie, her beautiful oval face with the broad, clear brow and the mischievous eyes: these were seen on many a makeshift rostrum; and wherever she went she drew people, held them as the ponderous philosophers and the thumping haranguers of the labor movement were unable to do. She shared the platform with Debs, Daniel de Leon, Jack London, and other Socialist celebrities. Then, suddenly, grown discontented with the pussyfooting of the Socialists, she left her compromising friends behind and marched out belligerently with the I. W. W. "I felt that direct action was needed," she explained, "not a concession wrung laboriously here and there, but a complete overthrow of the system under which the poor are exploited in the interest of the rich." Action: that was what she has ever craved. And though its tactics were often absurd, wild, and adolescent, the I. W. W. offered to the adventurous plenty of chances for action.

In those days the very mention of it threw pious and patriotic Americans into shudders of horror. It stood for all the wickedness which has since been represented in Southern and Western minds by Clarence Darrow and Moscow. There is no more madcap chapter in the whole history of American labor than that recounting the rise of the I. W. W. What a story it will make when it is written at last! The brains behind the organization in those days belonged to Vincent St. John, a quiet, solid little man with the taciturnity of the true pioneer, a grim fighter and a dead shot. Talk about your Jesse Jameses and your Billy the Kids! There are wobblies still alive with careers quite as reckless and daring behind them. Full of strident adventurousness, singing and defiant, they swept through the West. The county sheriffs said they were lazy bums and arrested them at sight. Thus the movement took on the character of a mad crusade, fanaticism and naïve shibboleths clashing with smugness and entrenched respectability. Upon this gaudy battlefield, with the glint of Irish pugnacity in her eye, soon emerged an eighteen-year-old leader. She confounded her enemies, the police. She laughed at them and played jokes on them. They put her in jail but they could not keep her there. Western editors combed the dictionary to find invectives against her. She remained irrepressible. No matter what they did she bobbed up again, fiery, fearless, clouting to the left and the right with her wit. Even when they triumphed over her she always saw to it that they went limping home from battle. At the very heart of the wobbly fight, revelling in the smoke and the dust, stood Gurley Flynn.

In Missoula, Montana, they jailed her for talking on the streets. Immediately she raised the cry of free speech and wired far and wide for help. Wobblies flocked into town and crowded the jails. Every box-car brought more and more. Soon there was no more room for them: even the fire-house was jammed. The city couldn't afford to feed them. In despair, the officials threw open the jails. The wobblies poured out, held their meetings on every corner, and then returned to their cells for the night. When they were refused admittance, they pounded on the doors. The whole countryside flocked in the next day to see the wobblies who wouldn't leave jail. After that there were no more arrests in Missoula for radical speeches.

Gurley Flynn found her next skirmish front in Spokane. To envisage the reception the good burghers of the town tendered the I. W. W., you need only read the opinion of a substantial citizen of the day, published in one of the local newspapers:

We are told in Holy Writ that about twenty centuries ago the man Jesus Christ sent His disciples into all parts of the world to preach the gospel of peace and good-will to all men—a gospel that has never wronged any one. And in all those centuries there has never been an emblem, banner, or flag devised or adopted by any country or nation that comes so near to carrying out the doctrines of Christianity as our own Stars and Stripes. I am one of those who firmly believe that Old Glory is a priceless gift from the Highest Powers in Heaven itself and woe to the nation or individual who attempts to destroy it, for there will arise in its defense the greatest army of God-loving, God-fearing, praying Christian men and women that this world has ever known.

Undaunted by visions of this army of the faithful, Gurley Flynn leaped nimbly into the thick of the battle, her red tie flapping. The I. W. W. rallied around her. They were forbidden to talk on street corners, but Gurley talked. Five editors of Industrial Solidarity, the wobbly newspaper, were arrested at their desks. Gurley became editor number six. The paper was suppressed. She revived it. She filled it full of impassioned editorials, full of satire, ridicule, wit. She laughed at the police and the courts and the substantial citizens. Before long they knew that this nineteen-year-old girl was the most dangerous wobbly of the crowd. They got her at last, just as she was about to deliver a speech. They charged her with conspiracy and held her in jail, demanding $5000 bail. None of her friends knew what $5000 looked like.

Depressed? Not on your life. The city jail, the county jail, even the school-house were crowded with fellow prisoners. Gurley became their spokesman. She issued statements shrewdly calculated to annoy her captors. Reporters, whom her humor and her charm always won over, interviewed her and photographed her. Somehow, it didn't look quite right, even to the army of "God-fearing, God-loving, and praying Christian men and women"—all this roar and thunder, all the weight of this ponderous artillery of justice aimed at one fragile little Irish girl. To cap it all, she exposed the fact that wholesale prostitution was being practiced in the jail with the connivance of the guards. So they rushed her trial and convicted her of conspiracy. But she fooled them again: on an appeal she won her case. By now the police were ready to cry quits. The ordinance against speaking on the streets was revoked and the wobblies released.

Gurley returned to her home in the Bronx, where, a month later, her son was born. She had been married to an I. W. W. organizer in Missoula and had left him six months later. "My marriage was a mistake," she said. "I blame nobody, but how can you know beforehand what it means to live with a person who is really a stranger to you?" The arrival of Buster Flynn ended her campaign in the West, in her memory the happiest of her life.

The big mill strike at Lawrence, Mass., broke in 1912. Strikes in those days were nothing like the somewhat polite affairs they have since, with one or two exceptions, come to be. Neither side asked or gave any quarter. Strikes on a large scale were still new and so they were looked upon with alarm by the public. They savored of revolution. What if a bunch of foreigners in some little burg in Massachusetts were getting starvation wages? Hell, nobody has to work in a mill if he doesn't want to! "Don't you know," said a judge to an arrested striker, "that a strike against your employer is a strike against God?" To which Cousin Bernard Shaw replied by cable from England: "Delightful medieval America! Always in the intimate personal confidence of God!"

Lawrence was put under martial law. Soldiers with fixed bayonets paced all day long before the mills. Meeting halls were closed, crowds dispersed. Arrests were numerous, sentences harsh and pitiless. One boy was bayoneted in the back by a soldier who was never even arrested. "Arrest him?" replied the marshal of the city at the subsequent congressional inquiry. "Why, you can't arrest a soldier for doing his duty."

Amid all this chaos, amid the babble of half a dozen languages, Gurley Flynn, who assumed command with Big Bill Haywood, moved, a cool and tranquil figure. Her tremendous fire and energy she reserved for her three or four daily speeches. Indefatigably she worked all that Winter, endless speaking, endless raising money, endless sitting with strike committees. As a strategic manœuvre, she and Margaret Sanger, then an unknown nurse, arranged to send the children of strikers to the homes of workers in other cities. The mayor and the chief banged down their fists. That would be a disgrace to Lawrence. The children of Lawrence were not starving. They would not let these wild-haired radicals put Lawrence in so ill a light. An attempt to stop the children as they were embarking at the railroad station resulted in a riot. The children themselves were jostled and trampled; women fainted. But presently Gurley Flynn was marching down Fifth avenue at the head of her diminutive army, placards bobbing in the air, shrill voices raised in strike songs. It was Heywood Broun who dubbed her Labor's Joan of Arc. The end of the strike was left-wing unionism's first victory.

When the New York waiters struck toward the end of the same year, it did not take the Times very long to discover that "a girl of 22 is the real power behind the hotel workers. She has organized the cooks, scullions, and waiters into an efficient fighting body and sees that their claims get the fullest publicity." It was a difficult strike to lead. The men were raw labor recruits, never before organized. They were torn by half a dozen clefts of nationality, hampered by lack of a common language, betrayed by panicky members, and hopelessly cut off from the sympathy of a public long exasperated by the tipping system. Gurley Flynn's success in welding into a fighting unit Greeks, Frenchmen, Italians, Germans and Negroes startled the veteran labor leaders. "Don't be afraid of your wife," she told them. "Tell her you'd rather go to work with a pick and shovel than go back to the hotel-keepers without winning this strike." She even attempted to abolish once and for all the odious tip. After an impassioned appeal, she got them to vote against it on condition that the hotel-keepers paid them a living wage. Had the strike been won Gurley Flynn would have achieved for the bourgeoisie she so heartily dislikes a rare benefit.

But the strike was doomed from the first. And Ettor dealt it its coup de grâce when he openly advised the men: "If you are compelled to go back under unsatisfactory conditions, go back with your minds made up that it is the unsafest thing in the world for the capitalist to eat food prepared by members of your union." The uproar was immense. What did he mean? Poison? The editorial writers of New York gasped and sputtered. This was going too far. The police threatened him with indictment. It was useless to explain that the poisoning was to be accomplished, not by dropping powders in the soup, but by "the withdrawal of labor." As for Gurley

Flynn, she calmly announced she would "prove by affidavits to the guest who sits down to a dainty dinner in a hotel that its daintiness rises out of a vile spot like a lily out of a mud hole; and that his meal is one-fifth poison anyway and one-fifth seasoned sauces for covering tainted food." But the editorial writers declared that she was only coarse and disgusting.

Toward the end of this uproar the newspapers began to announce in 36-point type: "Law's Iron Hand Crushes Paterson Textile Strike." But that was before Gurley Flynn arrived on the scene. Before another month had passed there were 12,000 strikers picketing the factories; and when, by April 1913, this number had increased to 25,000, it was reluctantly admitted that the "silk industry in Paterson is on the verge of complete paralysis." Mill owners bellowed "Reds! Reds!" City officials clamored about "subversive I. W. W. propaganda." Chief of Police Bimson became the principal caryatid of law and order. Personally, he liked the young Irish firebrand at the head of the strikers; but he considered her friends dangerous or ignorant aliens and her opinions high treason.

Bimson closed all the meeting halls. He arrested defiant hall owners "for running disorderly houses." He raided strike headquarters. He taught the strikers to know the feel of policemen's clubs. He drove from the city all outsiders, including too persistent reporters. Arrests were made without warrant or reason. City Hall anarchy prevailed. And when the chief announced that "we may be compelled to do things which we would not have legal grounds for doing in normal times," the newspapers of New Jersey sent up hosannas to God for an official "who has not a cowardly hair in his head."

Praising God for the heroism of the chief's hair, however, did not altogether dispose of Gurley Flynn. She was still in Paterson, thumbing her nose at the police force, editing a scorching strike bulletin, talking to half a dozen strikers' rallies a day, and being loved and hated as only a leader in battle can be loved and hated. The chief ordered her to quit the city or go to jail. She went to jail. He soon had to admit that she was unlawfully arrested, and the Paterson news purveyors recorded with ill humor that "the Flynn woman was once more at large." Later she was re-arrested and indicted for "preaching anarchy." The indictment, though quashed, was revived two and a half years later to stage a high farce in legal hocus-pocus.

When Gurley proclaimed that children were starving in Paterson even the mayor thumped indignantly on the City Hall tables. "We have a poormaster in the City Hall. Where are your hungry children? Bring them here." Gurley called his bluff. She brought them, 300 strong, and they marched round and round the Courthouse. But the mayor and the poormaster had skipped town. Gurley had scored again as a press agent.

The strike was lost. As in recent ructions, the American Federation of Labor played the traitor to left-wing unionism. Local leaders, some of them spies, came to terms with the manufacturers over the heads of the strike committee. Men and women stampeded back to the mills. There was nothing left for Gurley to do but send the loyal ones back too.

III

Unemployment hit New York like a blizzard in the Spring of 1914. Men, jobless, homeless, hunger gnawing at their vitals, sprawled in the open squares. Discontent fomented in their breasts. A young wobbly, scarcely twenty, went among them, leavening their rebellion with yeasty words, goading them into action. Suddenly, unexpected, they broke into revolt. Led by the boy, Frank Tannenbaum, they raided the First Presbyterian Church in Fifth avenue in search of shelter. They were turned out with $25. The money spurred them on. There followed the greatest revival of church-going recorded since the Middle Ages. All the other fashionable houses of God were invaded. The wobblies marched brazenly into St. George's Church, to the horror of the worshippers, and managed to get some sandwiches and coffee. Nightly the raids continued. The men demanded to sleep on the cushioned pews. Protests filled the papers. Petitions rained into the City Hall. Wobblies sleep on Fifth avenue pews? It was intimated that they were unwashed, infested with vermin! Church pews, indeed! The police declared a ban, but the raids grew more frequent, more bold. Fifty Gentiles polluted a Henry street synagogue in the midst of the Purim Feast. Three hundred unbelievers in the True Church disrupted a mass at St. Alphonsus'. They were trapped and jailed by Secret Service men who had trailed them, sleeping and eating with them. But the next day they were released: it was discovered that even in New York you couldn't arrest a man for going to church.

Gurley Flynn, Big Bill Haywood, Carlo Tresca, Emma Goldman, and Alexander Berkman stepped forward to direct this tatterdemalion battalion of the unemployed. A thousand strong, they paraded up Fifth avenue, stopping all traffic, hooting at autos, cursing the homes of the rich, singing the song of the idle: "Hallelujah, I'm a Bum!" One woman, the papers insisted, actually spat at a man in a motorcar! The parade ended in a riot at Union Square, where, after Gurley Flynn had cried that "coffee and doughnuts do not solve the unemployment problem," and inveighed against "a system which made starving and unemployment possible," the police had their inning with their clubs. The whole thing eventually sizzled down to a debate among the letter writers in the New York Globe on whether Christ would have wanted the I. W. W.'s to sleep in His churches. Frank Tannenbaum, after a careful trimming of edges at Columbia, developed into the most respectable of magazine writers.

Gurley Flynn now made her third entry into Paterson, and it was accompanied by fireworks. Having learned that the mills were repudiating agreements wrested from them in the strike of 1912, she attempted with Carlo Tresca to hold a workers' mass-meeting. Chief Bimson, still on the job, cried nay. His officers cleared the hall. Only Gurley and a reporter refused to go. Taken to the chief's office, she quoted the Bill of Rights and threatened to sue him for damages. "You may have the rights, but we have the power," he replied; and he had her escorted to the railroad station, where she was forced to board a train for New York. Leonard Abbott, Lincoln Steffens, and Thomas Wright now took up her cause, but when they held a protest meeting in Paterson they were raided and ordered out of town. A woman's free speech committee, headed by Mary Austin, Margaret Wycherly, Mrs. Robert Bruère, and Mrs. Claire Mumford, were acceded by Bimsonian authority the right "to talk on any subject except the labor question." A cordon of police allowed all but Gurley Flynn to enter the hall. She stood on the steps outside, unmolested by the now less aggressive arm of Jersey law, while her friends read her speech within. "These female radicals from New York," rasped the Paterson Press, mindful of the suffrage issue then before the country, "prove once and for all how incapable women are to vote."

Who would hint at deliberate malice when the city of Paterson, hard on the heels of this episode, suddenly revived the indictment "for advocating violence" which, two and a half years before, had been disposed of by a disagreeing jury? To Gurley's counsel, pleading for postponement of the trial because his client was ill, the magistrate replied: "Then bring her in a stretcher." Gurley came on foot—but not unattended. About her, with offers of financial and moral support, had flocked society women, preachers, editors, teachers, reformers—a group of celebrities including Walter Lippmann, Amos Pinchot, Zona Gale, Percy Stickney

Grant, B. W. Huebsch, Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, Ellen Hayes, Paul U. Kellogg, Herbert Croly and John Haynes Holmes.

Sixteen policemen quoted without flaw or omission a speech of eighty-six words wherein, two and a half years before, Gurley had allegedly "incited to violence." Written record of the speech? There was none. Gentlemen of the jury, the police officers of Paterson remembered that speech, word for word, all those thirty months. The court-room burst into laughter when the attorney for the defense read eighty-six words from a book and asked the testifying police to repeat them verbatim. The subsequent stammers were, upon the objection of the prosecutor, stricken from the records. The next day Gurley Flynn was acquitted. Perhaps the real reason was that, through the influence of political friends, she was tried before a hand-picked, solidly Irish, union jury from the neighboring county!

When, two weeks after, together with Carlo Tresca and John Reed, she delivered an untrammelled harangue before a large audience in Paterson, with never a policeman in sight, the Paterson Press wanted "one thing made clear: it will not be possible to make the newspapers of Paterson the goat for anything that may happen as a result of permitting I. W. W. agitators to return here with the one idea of stirring up strife in the silk industry."

IV

After the strike of the Mesaba Range iron miners in 1916, Gurley began to feel that her work with the I. W. W. was done. So she swung her energies into the defense of free speech. She had already left the party when, under the war-inspired Espionage Act, she and 166 wobblies were arrested, all charged with conspiracy. Gurley, like sixty-five of the others, demanded a severance of her case, and she was never tried. The remaining 101, at the insistence of Big Bill Haywood, were tried en masse and served varied sentences in Leavenworth. Big Bill's accusations of treason against those who refused to pose in his martyrdom tableau, his own bail-jumping and flight to Russia, and the bloody fist fights that broke out among his jailed disciples, were death blows to the I. W. W.

So died one of the most militant bands of rebels America ever nourished. Its philosophy was impractical, its aims often absurd, its tactics still oftener childish. The only American-born labor movement, it carried all the earmarks of its birth: muddled thinking, noisy assertion, millennial aspirations. Yet the wobblies, at their best, were gallant and picturesque fighters, steadfast in the face of vituperation and danger, and it was these qualities which drew Gurley Flynn to them.

Since 1918 her major activities have been turned toward the freeing of political prisoners. Today she holds key positions in the Liberal and labor worlds: as a member of the national committees of the American Civil Liberties Union and the Labor Defense Council, as vice-chairman of the League for Mutual Aid, as secretary for the American or Garland Fund for Public Service. "The Flynn woman will leave Paterson in a few days with fat pocketbooks," it was said of her during her last strike campaign; yet few women in any cause have suffered hardship and privation so resolutely and bravely. She lives in a single room on the East Side, in a rear house at the end of a dark and littered alleyway. In one day friends have known her to dash from the Passaic textile strike to the striking cloak-makers on the East Side, and then up to the Bronx for a labor talk to the defeated Irishmen of the subway strike.

There are really two Gurley Flynn. One is rarely met in public. She is a quiet, almost shy little woman, well-read, feminine in her tastes, and possessing a vast capacity for friendship and a great flow of charming conversation. The other is an indefatigable fighter, a woman with a stinging wit and a resourceful mind.

PREFACE

BY ROBINSON JEFFERS

I DREW solitude over me, on the lone shore,
By the hawk-perch stones; the hawks and the gulls are never breakers of solitude.
When the animals Christ is rumored to have died for drew in,
The land thickening, drew in about me, I planted trees eastward, and the ocean Secured the West with the quietness of thunder. I was quiet.
Imagination, the traitor of the mind, has taken my solitude and slain it.
No peace but many companions; the hateful-eyed
And human-bodied are all about me: you that love multitude may have them.

But why should I make fables again? There are many Tellers of tales to delight women and the people.
I have no vocation. The old rock under the house, the hills with their hard roots and the ocean hearted
With sacred quietness from here to Asia
Make me ashamed to speak of the active little bodies, the coupling bodies, the misty brainfuls
Of perplexed passion. Humanity is needless.
I said, "Humanity is the start of the race, the gate to break away from, the coal to kindle,
The blind mask crying to be slit with eye-holes."
Well now it is done, the mask slit, the rag burnt, the starting-post left behind: but not in a fable.
Culture's outlived, art's root-cut, discovery's
The way to walk in. Only remains to invent the language to tell it. Match-ends of burnt experience,
Human enough to be understood, Scraps and metaphors will serve. The wine was a little too strong for the new wine-skins. . . .

THE PALMY DAYS OF METHODISM

BY HERBERT ASBURY

WHEN Dr. Thomas Coke returned to England after the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Baltimore in 1784, Bishop Francis Asbury was left in sole command of American Methodism. With no one to interfere or question his authority, he began to manipulate the itinerancy as a military strategist manipulates his troops. Selecting a definite objective, generally a newly-settled area in which there were only a few families with Methodist leanings, he infiltrated the territory with missionaries who encouraged the Methodist men to become local preachers and exhorters, and began the preliminary organization of Methodist societies. Soon afterward, especially if the people were backward in their enthusiasm, he himself invaded the field, often accompanied by other preachers, all of them noted for their evangelistic ferocity. These were the shock troops; they charged valiantly into the very jaws of Hell. Their disregard of hardship became proverbial; in the frontier settlements beyond the Alleghenies there was a saying describing the worst conceivable weather: "There is nobody out today but crows and Methodist preachers." After these heroes had thrown the whole terrain into an uproar they were relieved by preachers who possessed organizing and administrative abilities. These were the mopping-up troops; they consolidated the positions won, encouraged the building of chapels, put the area under Methodist law, and prepared it for acceptance by the conferences as an organized circuit and working unit of the Church.

The result of this system was that revivals were soon in progress throughout the country, but especially in the South and along the edges of the wilderness. The first of the great series began in Brunswick county, Virginia, about the middle of 1787. More than a hundred were converted, after great travail, at a two-day meeting in Mabry's Chapel during the latter part of July, and many of the rescued rode into Sussex circuit early the next week for a great service in Jones's Chapel. This was a very uproarious gathering. Hundreds did not wait for the preachers to arrive, but began to weep and shout of their own accord as soon as they reached the chapel. Some trembled so violently at the mere sight of the temple that their hats were shaken from their heads. The pious screaming and groaning could be heard half a mile away, and when the preachers arrived they found the whole congregation on its knees. Scores fainted or had fits.

"Some were struggling as if they were in the agonies of death," says a Methodist historian. "Others lay as if they were already dead. . . . While the society was collected in the house some of the preachers went into the woods to preach, and while they were preaching the power of the Lord was felt among the people in such a manner that they roared and screamed so loud that the preacher could not be heard, and he was compelled to stop. Many scores of both white and black people fell to the earth, and some of them lay in the deepest distress until the evening."

This celestial frenzy was no respecter of persons; it attacked both the rich and the poor. Many of the wealthiest residents of the district were sweating and rolling on the ground in their fine silks and broad-cloths. A few days later another great meeting was held in Jones's Hole Church, and again the howling and lamenting were so loud that the preachers could not be heard. However, they could make signs, and from all parts of the church and the adjoining woods rose groans, grunts and shrieks as sinners struggled against the divine power. Some of the stricken crept about on their hands and knees, weeping and wailing; others were held unconscious in the arms of their friends; others were stretched on the floor or the ground as stiff as so many sticks; others foamed at the mouth and writhed in fits and convulsions, their arms and legs twitching spasmodically; others stood still and uttered blood-curdling shrieks; others went dancing about, inviting each other to go to Heaven; two noted converts became involved in a bitter argument as to who should precede who through the gates of Paradise. At the height of the orgy the sleepers of the church gave way, and the side wall collapsed. Several persons were hit by bricks and falling timbers, but they accepted the accident as no more than a sign of the presence and power of God. One man went prancing through the church screaming in pride that God had hit him personally with a brick.

This boiling over of divine grace occurred not only during the meetings, but also at other times. It was not uncommon for a man at work in the fields to suddenly exhibit twitchings, grunts and other occult signs, whereupon he would shout, pray and sing hymns. Other toilers would soon join him in shouting, dancing, weeping, and prancing. The inhabitants of several villages were brought into the fold en masse, and abandoned all secular employment to sing and have fits until hunger drove them back to work. The revival continued in Southern Virginia throughout the Summer, and there were 3500 conversions. In Brunswick 1800 got religion, in Sussex 1600, and in Amelia 900.

II

News of this working of the Methodist Holy Spirit in Virginia soon penetrated to the North and East, and there were many similar revivals, all accompanied by impressive vocal and muscular phenomena. The largest was staged in Baltimore in 1789. Baltimore had always been Asbury's favorite city, and in that year he proudly recorded that it housed more Methodists than any other place on the continent. Nelson Reed was sent in as presiding elder, and Ezekiel Cooper, Francis Spry and James Hagarty were assigned to shake up the faithful. Cooper and Spry, finding the people alarmed over the prevalence of smallpox, told them at once that the Lord was preparing to wipe out the town. In February, 1789, this warning bore fruit in a terrific outbreak at Fell's Point, and thereafter meetings were held every night. Scores of scoffers, attending for no other purpose than to laugh at the writhing saved, were themselves cast to the floor by the magic of the pastors. One night more than 4000 persons filled the church in Light street and jammed the streets nearby, and every day the preaching and singing and shouting continued until long after midnight.

The libido for salvation abated somewhat during the hot Baltimore June and July, but was renewed with redoubled vigor early in August. On the morning of August 10 Ezekiel Cooper was summoned to the home of one W. Buchanan, where he found a daughter of the house laboring under great distress; many believed that she was possessed of a devil. She lay in the arms of a sister who had only recently been converted, moaning faintly. "She had slept none all night," wrote Cooper, "but spent the hours mourning and sobbing. My heart was sensibly touched at her situation; her sorrow was truly penitential. I exhorted her to believe, and with confidence to venture her all upon Christ; I strove to press on her mind the all-fullness which dwells in Jesus, and His willingness that she should receive out of that fullness peace and pardon. I sung and prayed twice, and pointed her again to a bleeding Saviour."

But it was noon before the spell succeeded. Then, of a sudden, Miss Buchanan leaped to her feet with a whoop. She screamed that she saw Heaven and God and Jesus Christ and all the angels, prophets, cherubim, etc. Her yells were heard a great distance, and the report spread that the Buchanan home was on fire. The fire-bell was rung and people came running from all parts of Baltimore. When they reached the house they found the Buchanans and their friends leaning out of the windows shouting that the daughter had been converted and that everybody was seeing God. Miss Buchanan's nine-year-old sister, identified by Cooper as "Little P. B.," ran hither and yon, upstairs and down, shrieking and laughing. She finally climbed upon the porch railing, and screamed: "Oh, how merry I am! Sister is happy! Sister is happy! I got happy on Sunday and Sister on Monday!"

So many Baltimoreans were attracted by these proceedings that half of them could not get into the house; many climbed on piles of stove wood and peered into the windows. All yelled encouragingly when they saw the young woman sitting in a chair, her body shaking with holy laughter while she clasped her hands and described what she was seeing, which was a great deal. She was finally exhausted and the excitement subsided. However, before the crowd dispersed a report was received that similar miracles were being performed at the home of one N. Jones, where a group of Methodists had gathered at ten o'clock in the morning for prayer. Thither the crowd sped, and soon the Jones house was filled with marvelling spectators. Preachers arrived and began to exhort, and the crowd continued to come and go between the Buchanan and Jones houses all day. When dusk fell Cooper mounted a table in the street and preached to a crowd that constantly grew larger.

Night came on finally, and Cooper got down from his table and announced that the services would be continued in the church. Singing and shouting, he started through the streets. Scores of wailing mourners followed, but many were unable to go more than a block before they fainted; their friends then picked them up in their arms and plodded on. All Baltimore was in an uproar. In widely scattered sections men and women suddenly ran screaming from their houses and began dancing and prancing up and down the cobblestoned thoroughfares. All converged upon the Methodist church, with a great shouting, singing and laughing. They filled the church and jammed the streets near it, and until two o'clock in the morning the work of salvation went on. Every available preacher throughout the district was rushed into Baltimore and hurried to the church, and there, with the aid of experienced Methodist laymen, they proceeded to push and prod the sinners until they gave up.

The next day there was a monster service that continued without interruption for more than fourteen hours. All the while the sweating preachers neither ate nor slept, and some of them preached with such vehemence that they lost their voices. The effect on the citizens of Baltimore was tremendous. "Religion had now become the common topic of conversation," wrote the Rev. Ezekiel Cooper. "You could scarcely enter a shop, walk the street or market, but that you heard people on the subject of our shouting meetings, and the numerous conversions among us. A panic had seized upon numbers who did not know what to be at or do; some railed, others were afraid, while others approved of what had passed among us. It was the cry of some, 'The Methodists, at this rate, will get all the people.' " These effects continued to be manifest in Baltimore for a century. Not until Prohibition came in, indeed, did it become definitely wicked.

III

Revivals of the same high-powered sort continued among the Southern Methodists without cessation for the next ten years, and others broke out intermittently in the Middle States and the North. Even New England did not escape the holy fire and mustard gas. The Presbyterians, Baptists and other evangelical sects caught the fever, and throughout the United States there was a great increase of religious frenzy, which came to a climax in the Concert of Prayer of 1795. In 1796 the excitement swept westward into the Cumberland district of Kentucky, and then into Tennessee and northward through the Ohio and Allegheny valleys, culminating in the great revivals of 1797-1805, when camp-meetings first came into popularity and almost the entire population of the territory west of the mountains abandoned itself to religious orgies. All this was the natural flowering of Asbury's plan for the evangelization of the continent. In some sections the Presbyterians and the Baptists were numerically superior, and their preachers originated and dominated the meetings, but the groundwork for them was laid by Asbury and the Methodist itinerancy, and the plan and form were purely Methodist. And it was the Methodist preachers who performed the most astounding miracles. Eventually, the Presbyterians objected to the orgiastic character of the revivals and withdrew from official participation, and thereafter they were almost exclusively Methodist.

The million people who then lived along the frontier were particularly susceptible to preaching, for there was a great dearth of intellectual recreation among them. Their homes were rude shacks or log cabins, and the only reading matter available was religious literature distributed by the preachers and comprising such works as "The Pilgrim's Progress," Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," and Young's "Night Thoughts." But every household had a Bible and a hymnal containing the bloody songs of Isaac Watts. The schools were generally opened and closed with Scripture readings and prayer, and in many of them the Bible was used as a text-book of science, history and geography, as well as of holy living. Social intercourse was confined to the small and miserable towns, and reached its peak on court days, when the whole countryside rode or drove in. The settlements consisted generally of a meeting-house, a jail and court-house combined, a store and a few log cabins, and in some of the outlying districts they were surrounded by stockades as protection against the Indians and wild beasts. None of the cities of Ohio, Tennessee, Kentucky and Western Pennsylvania had yet arisen, and the major portion of the population was still in the woods. Even Pittsburgh had but 1565 inhabitants in 1800. Lexington, Ky., with 1,797, was the metropolis of a large area. Nashville could boast but 355 people, including 141 slaves, and Frankfort's population was 368 whites and 260 blacks. In this wild and lonely territory, from the southern border of Tennessee northward to the Ohio river and beyond, the Methodists were organized in twenty-seven circuits.

They held revivals in 1796 and early in 1797 throughout the Cumberland and Holston districts, but the first of really Pentecostal horse-power was conducted by the Rev. James McGready, a Presbyterian with Methodist talents. McGready was pastor of the churches at Gasper River, Red River and Muddy River, in Logan county, Kentucky, and started the uproar by binding his congregations to a solemn covenant to offer a special prayer each Saturday evening, each Sunday morning, and all day on the third Saturday of every month, for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the world in general and Logan county in particular. The Lord responded, as always, and reports of the furore in Logan county soon spread eastward and northward, and there was a general quickening throughout the West. In the revivals of every sect there was a gradual gain in attendance and an increase in fervor, but as yet there were only isolated instances of the wild excesses which became epidemic with the introduction of camp-meetings.

No one factor contributed more to the success of the great western revivals than these holy revels. Their origin has always been in dispute, and probably will remain so. Meetings similar in many respects were held by the Virginia Baptists during the early part of the Revolution, but at these only men remained on the meeting-grounds over night. This was a vital difference, for at genuine camp-meetings women take a very prominent part. There is a tradition in our family that the first Methodist camp-meetings were conducted in Lincoln county, North Carolina, by the Rev. Daniel Asbury, my great grandfather, several years before they were heard of in the West. This has been corroborated by a Methodist historian, who says that in 1794 the members of Rehoboth congregation in Lincoln county, which was organized by Daniel Asbury, held a camp-meeting in the forest near the church, which was so successful that it continued for several days. More than three hundred men and women were converted under the preaching of Daniel Asbury, William McKendree, Nicholas Watters, William Fulwood, and Dr. James Hall, a Presbyterian divine of Iredell county. The next year another meeting was held near the famous Rock Spring, and a few months later Daniel Asbury and James Hall conducted a great union meeting at Shepherd's Cross-Roads, in Iredell county, which was in progress more than a week.

Camp-meetings were introduced into the West about the middle of 1799, when John and William McGee, the former a Methodist exhorter and the latter a Presbyterian, arrived in Logan county, Kentucky, on a preaching tour out of Tennessee. They attended a meeting in McGready's church at Red River, and met with such astonishing success that the news of their prowess spread throughout the region, and at their next performance at Muddy River many families came with wagons and encamped in the woods. The plan met with instant favor, and thereafter camp-meetings were regular and important features of the revivals. They usually began on Thursday, or Friday, and continued until the following Tuesday or Wednesday. There was preaching morning, afternoon and evening, and sometimes the crowd became so hot for salvation that services had to be continued throughout the night. Both the pious and the impious settlers came from miles around, bringing bedding, provisions and tents, or sleeping in their covered wagons. The meetings reached perfection in Kentucky, where they attracted enormous congregations. More than 20,000 people thronged the grounds at Cabin Creek, a crowd almost as large appeared at another gathering at Cambridge, near Paris, and an even greater number attended the conclave at Cane Ridge, in Bourbon county, which centered about Elder Barton Stone's church.

Bishop Asbury regarded camp-meetings with favor; to him the spectacle of thousands of men, women and children leaping and yelling was proof of a visitation of the Lord, and he loved to hear the howling of the prophets belaboring the wicked. "I pray to God," he wrote, "that there may be a score of camp-meetings a week, and wonderful seasons of the Lord in all directions." And again, "I rejoice to hear that there will be four or five hundred camp-meetings this year." Wherever he went he urged them upon the Methodist circuits, and was even able to organize them in the districts around New York, Philadelphia and Boston; his Journal describes one at Philipse Manor, near New York City, which was attended by more than 6000 people, including a large delegation from Brooklyn. The first he attended personally was at Drake's Creek meeting-house near Nashville, in 1800. "Yesterday," he wrote, "and especially during the night, were witnessed scenes of deep interest. . . . The stand was in the open air, embosomed in a wood of lofty beech trees. The ministers of God, Methodists and Presbyterians, united their labors, and mingled with the childlike simplicity of primitive times. Fires blazing here and there dispelled the darkness, and the shouts of the redeemed captives, and the cries of precious souls struggling into life, broke the silence of midnight. The weather was delightful; as if Heaven smiled, whilst mercy flowed in abundant streams of salvation to perishing sinners. I rejoice that God is visiting the sons of the Puritans, who are candid enough to acknowledge their obligations to the Methodists."

IV

The most remarkable feature of the Western revivals was the extraordinary physical phenomena that accompanied them. They appeared early, and at first were similar to the simple shoutings and leapings with which Methodists everywhere had been familiar for more than fifty years, and by which they measured the holiness of their preachers; they had, indeed, been seen frequently in England under the ministry of George Whitefield and the Wesleys, and in this country under the exhortations of Benjamin Abbot, Robert Williams and Lorenzo Dow. But they reached a new peak at the camp-meetings, and as the excitement grew throughout the Ohio and Allegheny valleys they increased in volume and variety. Before the fever abated all the congregations were jerking, barking, jumping, hopping, dancing, prancing, screeching, howling, writhing in fits and convulsions, falling in cataleptic trances, and performing many other strange and holy antics.

The preachers themselves were often affected. They would be prostrated in the pulpit, or would go jerking and barking, or dancing around the meeting-house, crying the glories of the Almighty. The Rev. John Thompson was afflicted with what was called the dancing exercise during a meeting at Turtle Creek, Kentucky, and for more than an hour cavorted about his pulpit, keeping perfect time and murmuring over and over in a loud whisper, "This is the Holy Ghost—glory!" At a meeting in the Red River Church the Rev. William McGee suddenly sank unconscious to the floor, and his brother John trembled so violently that he could not preach. He was finally able to announce stutteringly that God had hold of him and was shaking him, and immediately there was a great uproar in the church. Many fell unconscious to the floor, but others only grunted. William McGee was sometimes so wrought upon that he descended from the pulpit and rolled over and over in the dirt, his eyes streaming with tears as he exclaimed, "Jesus! Jesus!" John was similarly affected, and was also impelled to creep about on his belly like a snake, uttering weird cries and exhorting. This performance was generally regarded as having something or other to do with the Garden of Eden. Other preachers were addicted to holy hopping and dancing, and stopped their sermons while they pranced up and down the aisles and around the preaching stand. One North Carolina exhorter fell a victim to an extremely distressing affliction: he sometimes stopped in the middle of his sermon, shouted that God was in the house, and then began to squeal like a pig. Thenceforth his sermon was constantly interrupted by the cry of "oink! oink! oink!" and sometimes his friends had to prevent him from rooting in the ground with his nose.

The children of the pioneer Methodists attended the camp-meetings with their mothers, and the effect of the excitement upon them was all that the most ferocious preacher could desire. Almost invariably they were among the first to be tormented by visions of Hell, and were encouraged to scream their love of Jesus and their fear of the devil. At almost every meeting the congregations stood entranced before the spectacle of children crawling about on their hands and knees, jerking, barking and foaming at the mouth. Often they were raised to the shoulders of their proud fathers, where they told the people what was wrong with the human race, and invited them to go to Heaven. At a meeting at Flemingsburg, in Fleming county, Kentucky, in April, 1801, a peculiarly captivating performance was provided by two little girls about nine or ten years old. They were affected early, and began to twitch and jerk, and once in a while uttered hoarse barking sounds. Throughout the meeting they constantly cried out in great distress, while preachers and volunteers crowded about them and urged them to make ready for the celestial kingdom. Finally one of the children turned to the other and shrieked, "O you little sinner! Come to Christ!" and continued to so exhort until her companion fell in a faint. She then picked the victim up in her arms and lugged her down to the pulpit, crying, "Here is another star of light!"

A month later, at a meeting held by both Methodists and Presbyterians at Indian Creek, in Harrison county, Kentucky, a twelve-year-old boy ran around the stand for ten minutes, barking furiously, while the preachers cheered him on. He then loped into the forest, where he mounted a fallen log and began to preach. Tears streamed from his eyes as he alternately barked and jerked. Two preachers supported him, and he talked for more than an hour. Finally he held his handkerchief aloft, and dropping it slowly, cried out, "Thus, O sinners, shall you drop into Hell unless you forsake your sins and turn to the Lord!" He then fainted. This was a new sort of spell, and its effect was very powerful. As the handkerchief fluttered to the ground many shouted that it was wringing wet with the blood of Jesus, and the crowd was stampeded. Some began to bark, some jerked, some danced, some hopped, some just stood and wept, and others fell to the ground and bounced hither and yon. At another meeting a little girl, ten years old, exhorted for two hours. At still another, near Ten Mile, in Pennsylvania, a little boy wept bitterly and would not be comforted. "Oh! I am lost forever!" he cried. "I am going right down to Hell! Oh! I see Hell, and the breath of the Lord like a stream of brimstone kindling it!"

The jerking exercise appears to have started among the Methodists of Eastern Tennessee, but it soon became epidemic throughout the territory of the revivals. It was confined at first to a spasmodic twitching of the forearm, but later affected every muscle and tendon of the body. It was especially severe upon the muscles of the neck, for the head of the jerker flew backward and forward and from side to side with great rapidity, and with such force that head-dresses and even handkerchiefs which had been bound tightly around the cranium were shaken off. Sometimes the subject's head would describe a circular motion, which he generally followed by spinning his whole body around like a top. The jerks became so prevalent that they occurred when the tormented one was not under the direct influence of preaching, and once a man or woman became a victim of the exercise it was renewed at the mere mention of it. Women frequently began jerking while engaged in their household duties, and laborers suddenly left off their work in the fields and began to bob up and down. But the jerks were principally in evidence at camp-meetings; sometimes every member of the congregation was affected. "I have seen more than five hundred people jerking at once in my large congregations," wrote the Rev. Peter Cartwright. "Most usually persons taken with the jerks were generally very severe. To see these proud young gentlemen and young ladies, dressed in their silks, jewelry and prunella from top to toe, take the jerks, would often excite my risibilities. The first jerk or so, you would see their fine bonnets, caps and combs fly; and so sudden would be the jerking of the head, that their long loose hair would crack almost as loud as a wagoner's whip." Sometimes a measure of relief would be obtained if the jerker could catch hold of something. Lorenzo Dow described a camp-meeting ground in a Kentucky grove, where all the saplings had been cut off at the height of a man's chest, so the jerkers could hold on to them when the "exercises" began. Frequently during a meeting a hundred men and women could be seen clinging to the trees and jerking violently.

The jerks generally subsided of their own accord. Blood-letting and other attentions by the medical faculty seldom had any effect. They left a trail of shattered nerves all over the West, and occasionally were fatal. Cartwright thus described the death of a jerker at a camp-meeting conducted by William McGee and others on the Ridge in Kentucky:

There was a very great work of religion in the encampment. The jerks were very prevalent. There was a company of drunken rowdies who came to interrupt the meeting. These rowdies were headed by a very large drinking man. They came with their bottles of whiskey in their pockets. This large man cursed the jerks, and all religion. Shortly afterward he took the jerks and he started to run, but he jerked so powerfully he could not get away. He halted among some saplings, and although he was violently agitated, he took out his bottle of whiskey, and swore he would drink the damned jerks to death; but he jerked at such a rate that he could not get the bottle to his mouth, although he tried hard. At length he fetched a sudden jerk, and the bottle struck a sapling and was broken to pieces, and spilled his whiskey on the ground. There was a great crowd gathered round him, and when he lost his whiskey he became very much enraged, and cursed and swore profanely, his jerks still increasing. At length he fetched a very violent jerk, snapped his neck, fell and soon expired, with his mouth full of cursing and bitterness. . . . I always looked upon the jerks as a judgment of God.

Most of the early Methodist divines agreed with Cartwright that the jerks and other such phenomena were of supernatural origin, and encouraged their converts to yield to them; those who gave the most spectacular performances were considered the most blessed. Asbury approved of this attitude, although he once remarked that the "exercises" were not of themselves final proof of acceptance by the Lord. The schismatic Presbyterians, led by Elder Stone, McNemar and others, also rejoiced at the sight of jerking, howling, barking congregations, but the excesses of the camp-meetings were opposed by the Baptists and the regular Presbyterians. The Baptists held that they were signs of demoniacal possession, and pointed proudly to the exploit of a Baptist preacher whose congregations suddenly began to howl and jerk in unison. He levelled his finger at the front row and shouted: "In the name of the Lord I command all unclean spirits to leave this place!" Immediately the jerks subsided. The intelligent minority among the settlers also objected to the orgies which went on at the revivals, and particularly deplored the promiscuous sex relations which naturally grew out of such constant and unrestrained mingling of men and women when both were emotionally unbalanced. This was always a most dangerous phase of camp-meeting activity, for the wall between religious frenzy and sexual passion is very thin, and then, as now, camp-meetings were followed by a great increase in the number of illegitimate births.

But the Methodists did not find it difficult to produce evidence that the "exercises" were directly from the hand of God, for the scoffer was frequently smitten with the jerks and barks at the moment of his sneering. One man remarked to another at a sacramental meeting in Tennessee, "I am persuaded it is the work of the devil." Scarcely had the words left his lips when he screamed and tumbled headlong from a log on which he had been standing. He jerked for hours and then hastened to join the Methodists. Jacob Young, a Methodist itinerant, told his customers that the jerks were a judgment of God sent especially against their community, and immediately five hundred men and women began jerking, jumping and dancing. A Kentucky youth, ordered by his parents to attend a camp-meeting, told them he was ill and remained in bed. But he could not get to sleep. His mind turned to the camp-meeting, and he thought particularly of a young woman who was a noted jerker. Suddenly he was jerked out of bed and around the room. He prayed, the jerks subsided, and he returned to bed. But again he thought of the young woman, and was again hurled from his bed. He dressed, went into the yard and started unhairing a dogskin. But the graining knife was flung out of his hand, and he was jerked to and fro about the yard. He was again relieved by prayer, but when he resumed his work the jerking was renewed. He finally went to his room and began to weep, and when his family returned he was on his knees begging for mercy.

The holy barking exercise frequently, but not always, accompanied or preceded the jerks, and also became epidemic throughout the revival region. "It was common," wrote a Kentucky preacher, "to hear people barking like a flock of spaniels on their way to meeting. There they would start up suddenly in a fit of barking, rush out, roam around, and in a short time come foaming back. Down on all fours they sometimes went, growling, snapping their teeth and barking just like dogs." Some of the converts who had visions and went into trances reported that throughout the period of unconsciousness their bodies were permeated with a peculiar perfume, which was obviously celestial, and appeared to them to be similar to the smell of Christ's garments. Others, beside barking and jerking, rolled over and over, or turned cart-wheels; and still others ran in a straight line until they fell exhausted or came up against a tree. At one meeting in Western Pennsylvania fifty noses were broken by being butted against hard saplings, and more than a hundred others bled profusely. This gathering was accounted very successful. Many who had reached the heights of ecstasy through barking, jerking, running, jumping or dancing, suddenly began to sing in a very peculiar manner, the sound issuing from the chest instead of the throat. They explained that they occupied choice seats in the Heavenly City, and were trying to join in the singing of the angelic host.

The falling exercise, which had been common in Methodist meetings since the first field preaching of the Wesleys and George Whitefield, appeared in the West in July and August, 1788, when James Haw reported by letter to Asbury that several were prostrated during quarterly meetings in Bourbon county, Kentucky. This holy toppling became a regular feature of the great revivals, and continued to be the most popular. Scores fell at every meeting, and at some of the large gatherings hundreds and even thousands were down at one time. Some of the victims had no preliminary warning; others reported that they felt tingling sensations in the right elbow, appropriately near the funny bone, or in the arteries of the upper thigh. Immediately thereafter the toppler experienced a very distressing shortness of breath, and his heart seemed to be swelling. He screamed and fell to the floor, and "every tear now leaves his eye, and he shouts aloud for about twenty minutes. Meanwhile the features of the face are calm and regular. His voice becomes more and more feeble for about twenty minutes more. By this time he is speechless, and motionless, and lies quiet perhaps an hour. During this time his pulse is rather lower than the usual state—the extremities are cold, the skin fresh and clear, the features of the face full, the eyes closed, but not so close as in sleep. Speech and motion return in the same gradual manner; the features become more full than before."

More than a thousand fell at the Cabin Creek meeting in Kentucky, and to prevent their being trodden under foot by the horde of stamping, screaming converts they were collected and laid out on two sides of the meeting-house, where they remained unconscious for hours. This humane procedure was followed at all the more important meetings, and sometimes as many as fifty men neglected their own salvation to carry the fallen under shelter; often the building would be filled with them. The exercises reached the peak of frenzy at the great Cane Ridge meeting, in Bourbon county, Kentucky, which began on Friday, August 6, 1801, and continued without intermission until the following Thursday. During this time there was continuous preaching and exhorting by seventeen preachers, and by an untold number of volunteers. It has been estimated that at one time 3000 people lay unconscious before the preaching stands, and that as many as 500 jerked and barked in unison. One prayer of fifteen minutes duration by the Rev. William Burke, a famous itinerant, felled several hundred of his hearers; they dropped to the ground one after another, as if they had marched into a burst of machine-gun fire.

VI

This was probably the wildest and most ferocious Methodist gathering ever held in the United States. Between 25,000 and 30,000 people attended; they came from as far away as a hundred miles, and for days before the preaching began the roads were filled with wagon trains, and singing, ecstatic pilgrims plodding through the dust and heat. The meeting began in a grove, in the center of which was Cane Ridge Church, but the excitement soon became so intense and widespread that all unity was lost, and the furor spread over a square mile and more of territory. When night came torches and oil lamps shed a ghostly, flickering light upon the scene, and the weirdness and solemnity of the surroundings combined with the screaming denunciations of the preachers to throw the vast congregation into wild excesses. The sound of the barking, shouting, singing and howling was audible more than five miles away, and sometimes the ground shook as the frenzied thousands stamped and leaped in their frantic efforts to escape Hell. Throughout the adjacent forest the preachers, mounted on stumps and logs, screamed their threats of damnation and promises of eternal glory, and in every grove and clearing were groaning, grunting groups, not all of whose excesses, perhaps, were strictly religious in character. Little children went barking and jerking through the throngs; one child was considered especially blessed because she barked hoarsely, like a mastiff, while the best the others could do was to imitate spaniels or other small dogs. Another girl of seven perched upon a preacher's shoulder and shrieked descriptions of Heaven and Hell that sent hundreds into convulsions; they grovelled and rolled upon the ground, beseeching the Lord to take them away from the hard labor of the frontier and conduct them to choice places amid the delights of Paradise. This was probably the greatest camp-meeting ever held. It makes a brilliant purple spot in Methodist annals.

THE ARTS AND SCIENCES

Bacteriology

THE BACTERIOPHAGE

BY ROSCOE SPENCER

THE business of the biologist is the study of living things. He is not concerned, primarily, with dead matter, but with the structure and function of living forms. Therefore, he should be able to recognize life when he sees it—to distinguish the living from the non-living. But can he? As a rule, yes; but not always.

Æsop tells of a war between the birds and the beasts in which the bat, possessing characteristics of both, could, at will, safely join either side or remain neutral. Similarly, if we scan the biological scale from man to monad, we encounter certain borderline types, such as the mycetoza, which resemble both animals and plants. The systematic biologist has found these forms far more difficult to classify than the bat. Still further down lie forms which cannot be seen by the most powerful microscopes, and are known to exist only by their effects. What are they? So little is known of their structure, chemical composition and life history that they cannot be classified at all.

Many diseases of man, animals and plants seem to be caused by these lowest of living things. Smallpox in man, the hoof-and-mouth disease in cattle, and the mosaic disease in tobacco plants are typical of this class. If a small amount of material from a smallpox pustule is spread on the clean-shaven skin of a calf, numerous other pustules will form in from seven to nine days. Material from one of these pustules may then be transferred to other animals and the process repeated indefinitely. We are forced to conclude, therefore, that the active principle somehow multiplies.

But how? No one knows. Nothing in this material has ever been identified under the microscope as the disease agent, although the search for some kind of formed matter, an organism or cell, has been carried on since the days of Pasteur and Koch. There are, as everyone knows, many diseases of man and animals that are caused by comparatively large forms, the bacteria. But other disease viruses are so small that they apparently approach the size of the larger chemical molecules. In consequence some of our Carrels and Loeb's are wondering if the bacteria themselves may not have parasites. It is entirely possible.

In 1915 Twort, an Englishman, discovered an invisible agent which dissolved and thus destroyed a culture of a micrococcus. A drop of the dissolved organisms, when added to a fresh culture, would completely dissolve it also, and this process could be repeated indefinitely. Was he dealing with a living parasite of the bacteria? Or with a ferment secreted by the micrococcus itself, which produced thus its own destruction? Twort was unable to decide and perhaps displayed good judgment in not theorizing too much. Later D'Herelle, a Frenchman, found a similar substance in the secretions of dysentery patients; it attacked the dysentery bacillus. He named it a bacteriophage, which means a bacteria consumer. Since then a bacteriophage has been found for many other organisms.

The reality of these bacteriophages can be demonstrated, but observers have not yet agreed as to whether they are independent living units—autonomous beings capable of reproducing their kind—or merely ferments secreted by the bacterial organism under abnormal conditions. In many ways a bacteriophage resembles the ferments (enzymes), which are non-living catalytic agents—the organic products of living cells. But though it has all the characteristics of a ferment, it has more beside. It is a ferment capable of multiplying indefinitely when given its suitable medium, which is the living bacterial cell. It will not attack dead bacteria. It behaves in the bacterial body in a fashion indistinguishable from that of a virus of disease in the cells of plants and animals. D'Herelle showed that its dissolving power may be enhanced, or, in other words, its virulence increased, by passing it in succession through fresh bacterial cultures, just as the virulence of bacteria may be increased by successive passages through the animal body. Ferments possess no such qualities. Furthermore, it has been repeatedly shown that the bacteriophage acts in units or quanta, and that these units can be counted just as bacteria are counted. D'Herelle thus insists upon its independent existence as a bacterial parasite, claiming it has all the fundamental attributes of life, namely, assimilation, adaptation and reproduction, but many other investigators are opposed to this view. They regard it as simply a ferment which is manufactured by some abnormal process of bacterial metabolism; they show that there is no increase in bacteriophages unless the bacteria themselves are growing or in process of multiplication. They also call attention to the fact that a much higher temperature is required to destroy a bacteriophage than is required for the destruction of the usual living forms, to the fact that it has high resistance to alcohol, ether and other antiseptics, and to its extremely small size as measured by its ability to penetrate colloidion filters. Finally they point out that there is no evidence that it can respire, that is, consume oxygen and give off carbon dioxide.

At the present time, therefore, the bacteriophage may be regarded either as a ferment produced by bacterial activity or as an independent organism which preys upon the bacterial cell. This uncertainty has made its study one of the most interesting and romantic enterprises of research launched in a decade. Can it be a ferment derived from the bacterial cell and at the same time take on an independent existence? Is it a mutation? Scientists are, at least, acquainted with something analogous: the malignant cancer. Cancer cells bear a relation to the animal body not unlike that between the bacteriophage and the bacterial body. It has been shown experimentally that they will not develop when transplanted in the body of any other species than that from which they came. The investigator who discovers what induces or stimulates these cells to go it alone, to become outlaws, will have taken a big step toward an explanation of the mystery. In the same way the bacteriophage may be considered as a bacterial cancer—a parasite of the bacterial species with which it is found associated, and the solution of either problem will very likely result in the solution of the other. But regardless of theories, the fact remains that the bacteriophage is a thing new to science, a borderline something, a kind of tertium quid which lies in the twilight zone between living and non-living forms. The literature upon the subject is already voluminous, and imaginative and adventurous scientists have indulged in so much speculation and controversy in regard to its nature that the more practical minded have facetiously and, perhaps, aptly referred to these discussions as transcendental bacteriology.

Nevertheless, the discovery of the bacteriophage has stimulated a healthy interest in the whole subject of invisible ultra-viruses. Biologists are beginning to suspect that herein may lie some fundamental secret of life, since the bacteriophage appears to be representative of the most primitive of living forms, which lie, figuratively, at the very roots of the tree of life and are perhaps the connecting links between living and non-living matter. Consequently, certain research workers in this field no longer regard life as something in the shape of a cell, something formed with a body, or limiting membrane, or capsule. Why should not life exist in an amorphous, non-particulate or non-corpuscular form? The smallest cell is comparatively complex, as is shown by its reaction to simple dyes. If the evolutionary hypothesis is correct, it is argued, there must be simpler forms of life. Just as the physicist has, during the last decade, shown us that the atom is not the smallest particle of inanimate matter, so the biologist begins to cherish hopes of demonstrating that the cell is not the smallest living particle. The modern physicist is concerned chiefly with electrons and protons; the modern biologist with ultra-viruses, microplasms and colloidal micellæ.

A few years ago bacteriophagy had not been heard of. It is now an established branch of both biology and bacteriology. "Knowledge is like the surface of a sphere; the more it grows, the more it comes in contact with the unknown."

Physiology

THE MYSTERY OF THE HORMONES

BY L. M. HUSSEY

ALTHOUGH the extension of theological legislation in the Republic may soon make the viewpoint illegal, physiologists still look upon the living human organism as a complex physico-chemical machine. But while never wholly losing sight of this mechanistic concept, many physicians and even biochemists tend to forget the factor of complexity. This tendency toward a dangerous simplification is seen at times among the indubitably learned; as for the larger body of practicing physicians, they are in this respect excessively gullible.

Their credulity, with its accompaniment of erroneous theory and irrational practice, flourishes nowhere more generously than in the field of the glandular secretions. The fact that the chemical mysteries of these secretions, these hormones, begin at last to yield to investigation seems to stimulate, rather than diminish, the body of error that characterizes their use in the treatment of disease. In the days of Brown-Séquard, and for many years after, the functions of most of the glands were scarcely guessed at, and the hormones that they secreted were unknown. At such a time one might reasonably look for a great deal of gaudy guessing, with its accompanying quack theory and practice. The physicians of the day, however, paid virtually no attention to the glands. Their interest did not actually develop until rather recently—that is, not until after sufficient evidence had accumulated to demonstrate that the hormones and other gland substances, due to their highly complex functions, should be used in therapy only with great caution. Once this was established, their unrestricted use began, in many quarters, to flourish!

A part of that therapy has been less the result of quackery than of simple-mindedness. Thus when J. J. Abel, of the Johns Hopkins, something like two decades ago, isolated epinephrin, an active principle of the suprarenal capsule, it was at once gratuitously assumed that several great physiological mysteries had been simultaneously solved. Since it was found that epinephrin, when injected into the body, raised the blood-pressure, it was concluded immediately that the pressure of the blood was strictly regulated, in the normal human body, by this interesting substance, poured into the blood stream from the gland of its secretion. As a result of this theory some curious therapeutic measures were adopted. Later it was found that the function of epinephrin in the human body was by no means so simple, and then the problem of blood-pressure became a mystery again, and so did the exact purpose of the suprarenal gland.

A more recent example of medical simple-mindedness, having behind it widespread official support, is seen in the indiscriminate advocacy of iodine as a goiter preventive in the so-called Goiter Belt. In certain of the Western States, as, for instance, Wisconsin, simple goiter is an unusually prevalent disease. Now, there are two major forms of goiter and the variety known as simple goiter is an enlargement of the thyroid gland, due to a deficiency in the thyroid hormone. In the other and more dangerous type, known as the exophthalmic, the gland also enlarges, but there is no lack of thyroid hormone. In exophthalmic goiter too much secretion occurs, with a consequent train of perilous symptoms.

It has long been known that iodine has a beneficial influence on simple goiter. Not long ago the thyroid hormone, due to the researches of E. C. Kendall, was isolated and named thyroxin. Thyroxin was shown to contain iodine. Inferentially, at least, it therefore appeared that simple goiter might result from a lack of sufficient iodine in the food supply, with a resulting deficiency in the secretion of thyroxin. And coincidentally it was found that in the Goiter Belt the water supply—and it is from water and salt that iodine compounds are normally supplied to the body—was lacking in iodine.

At once there was instituted an enthusiastic prophylactic therapy. The refiners of salt were urged to restore to their product a portion of the iodine lost in the refining process. Small amounts of iodine compounds were added to the town water supplies. One investigator, writing enthusiastically a year or so ago in the American Journal of the Medical Sciences—one of the oldest and most orthodox of publications—advocated putting an iodine salt into the reservoirs of all cities in the Goiter Belt, and educating the people of smaller communities to the use of iodine tablets.

A little later, however, A. S. Jackson, in the same journal, observed that the indiscriminate administration of iodine to whole populations was dangerous, for in a certain type of goiter, the adenomatous kind, the administration of even minute amounts of iodine produces the perilous exophthalmic variety. Still later, another investigator gave warning that all prophylactic administration of iodine should be individual and the dosage carefully regulated, lest exophthalmic goiter appear.

The dispassionate observer concludes that all is not known about the thyroid and its secretion. Wholesale attempts to influence this secretion must obviously result in many untoward phenomena. The enthusiasts simply overlook the mysterious complexity of glandular secretion and function, which are a part of the general complexity of human metabolism. In their eyes the body becomes less an elaborate and largely uninvestigated physico-chemical machine than a simple test-tube into which a chemical reagent may be poured with the naïve expectation of a neat and clearly defined reaction.

Thyroxin, a definite chemical substance, has, as I said a moment ago, been isolated from the thyroid gland. This is an achievement; it measurably decreases the unknown factors in thyroid functioning. But under what conditions is thyroxin formed in the gland? Iodine apparently influences its production, but what else? Is it the only secretory product of importance or does the gland elaborate further hormones as yet unknown? Will a definite deficiency of iodine in the food supply invariably give rise to an enlargement of the thyroid—that is, to simple goiter? Or must there be, initially, some other factor?

Here are questions of great importance that remain unanswered, yet they relate to a gland that has received, in all probability, more investigation than any other of the ductless system. There is a plain possibility that a definite nervous stimulation has some relation to the thyroid and its hormone. Here is a problem of endocrinology upon which much has been postulated but little work performed. One of the few experimental approaches to the problem has been made recently in the Harvard Medical School by S. W. Britton, whose work, however, related not to the thyroid but to the pancreas.

It is now common knowledge that there has been prepared from pancreatic tissue a highly active extract known as insulin, which has the power, when introduced into the blood stream of diabetics, of influencing the destruction of excessive blood sugar. Insulin is one of the pancreatic hormones. But what regulates its secretion in the healthy pancreas? Britton has been able to demonstrate that one of the direct regulating factors is the right vagus nerve. When this nerve is experimentally stimulated, the secretion of insulin increases, as is shown by a decrease in the blood sugar. When the stimulation is withdrawn, the blood sugar returns to its normal level.

Here, in respect to a single hormone, a part, but only a small part, of the mystery surrounding its production in the gland vanishes before investigation. Another insulin mystery may be expected shortly to yield the secret of its chemical composition. Heretofore insulin has been known only as a more or less impure if potent extract, but a few months ago Abel announced his preparation of the pure substance, in the form of crystals. Any chemist will understand that as a step toward the understanding of insulin's chemical structure, its isolation in a pure state, in a crystalline form, is a long one.

However, even were the chemical nature of insulin fully known at this moment, the hormone would still invite speculation and study. Its very action in the blood remains unknown. I do not mean that the obvious results of its administration are a mystery. Everyone knows that insulin, added to the blood, will reduce blood sugar, and so, in cases of diabetes, relieve the outstanding symptoms of the disease. But how does it bring about this destruction of sugar in the blood?

The problem is not simple. It is an instance of the general complexity of all glandular and hormonal problems. We know, for instance, that insulin does not destroy sugar by direct action, in the sense that a little sulphuric acid, poured upon sugar in a test tube, will destroy it. Insulin, admitted to the blood stream of a diabetic, does not act directly in lowering the amount of sugar (glucose) in the circulation. Instead, it brings about the intervention of other substances or factors that result in the disappearance of the glucose. What are these factors? Does insulin cause a change in the arrangement of the sugar molecule and so render it oxidizable? Lundsgaard and Holbøll, of the University of Copenhagen, a few months past, reported the discovery of a new variety of glucose obtained by mixing together glucose and insulin with the addition of a little fresh muscle tissue. This form, which differs from ordinary glucose in its optical properties, they regard as a product of the first step in the oxidation of glucose within the body. But their theory requires confirmation and much of the mystery remains.

Insulin is now known in the pure state, although its chemical structure is yet unveiled. Thyroxin is known and its chemistry as well. And, of course, epinephrin and its chemistry have been a part of knowledge for two decades. But what of pituitrin, the active extract of the pituitary body? What of the extract Collip lately obtained from the parathyroid gland, an extract potent in regulating the amount of calcium in the circulation? What of the secretory products of the gonads and the ovaries?

Not one of these hormones has been obtained in the pure state. Potent glandular extracts are known, but the pure hormones are as yet unidentified. Their chemistry remains, of course, a secret of nature still undivulged. The precise mechanism of their functioning is even more obscure. In the matter of the female sex hormone, much surprising information has come to light during the past year in reference to the tissues in which it is secreted. Previously the ovary was regarded as the chief locus of secretion. Now, however, Doisy, Allen, Frank and other investigators have shown that an apparently identical hormone can be obtained from the ovarian follicle, the corpus luteum and the placenta in pregnancy. This interesting hormone, when injected into young female animals, brings about a swift and premature puberty. What is its chemical nature? Whence does it come, and from what structures? How does it function within the body? These questions cannot, at present be answered.

So complex are the gland problems and the problems of the accompanying hormones that major errors have been made even in connection with the basic function of certain glands. An instance, brought to light within the past twelve-month, is that of the pituitary body. This little gland is situated at the base of the brain, to which it is attached as well as to the skull. Although its precise function, and the function of its hormone or hormones have remained obscure, it has long been held that its removal inevitably resulted in death. Such an opinion naturally elevated the pituitary to a position of importance in the glandular system. No one could explain just why it was necessary to life, yet without it apparently life ceased. Whenever the pituitary was removed from a laboratory animal there followed lassitude, drowsiness, convulsions, coma, and death.

It occurred, however, to Dandy and Reichert, of the Johns Hopkins, that the same train of symptoms also followed surgical injury to the base of the brain. Since the pituitary is in an isolated anatomical position, making its surgical removal, without injury to the surrounding tissue, extremely difficult, they argued that death resulting from hypophysectomies, that is to say, removal of the pituitary, was the result of injury to the brain, and not a consequence of pituitary loss. By the application of a new surgical technique they found that they could actually remove the pituitary without consequent death. Their technique simply avoids the injuries to surrounding brain tissue involved in other operative procedures.

Thus an ancient error—the necessity of the pituitary to life—falls before investigation. The work of the Baltimoreans makes the pituitary gland a somewhat less awesome and romantic organ than it used to be. However, if mystery means romance, much of the old quality still attaches itself to the same little organ. And a like romance of the unknown still surrounds all the other glands of the endocrine system. Before it vanishes under investigation, much that is droll in glandular therapy, I predict, will be practiced, and much that is droll in theory, I similarly foresee, will be enunciated.

THE MORAL LAW

BY WILLIAM SEAGLE

IT was but a few years ago that Gustavus Meyers compiled a book of historical legislative imbecilities, entitled "Ye Ancient Blue Laws." Now it has become a practical handbook for district attorneys in Tennessee and Massachusetts, not to mention Kansas and California. Anti-evolution laws, like the Volstead Act, have ceased to be jokes. Even the usually heathenish Federal government begins to give evidence of falling into line. On all sides our so-called moral legislation has degraded the fine solemnity and dignity which once, in Anglo-Saxon Common Law lands, characterized the legislative act. The new constitutional doctrine is that all legislation for the public health, safety or morals, however extravagant, is within the scope of the police power. Thus the rustic lawmakers are able to give their fancy free scope. In a general way, nearly everyone is acquainted with the scope of these new laws. But there are many of them which are so nearly sui generis that the average man is still unaware of their existence.

Naturally the God-fearing have concentrated on the schools. In the Bible Belt, school and church are one and inseparable. Laws requiring instruction in the baneful effects and frightful consequences of stimulants and narcotics are rapidly becoming commonplaces. If not all the States in the South ban evolution in the public schools, they at least try to fortify the minds of the young against it. In all, thirteen States now have compulsory Bible reading laws. Long ago many of the State courts decided that at Common Law it was lawful to permit the Bible to be read in the schools. Such a gratifying result was reached, for example, in Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas and Virginia. But in Louisiana, Illinois and Wisconsin the decisions had been unfavorable, and this made for uncertainty and a parlous state of affairs. True, two States, Iowa and New Jersey, had specific laws mentioning the Bible with approval. But the Iowa act merely said tersely that "the Bible shall not be excluded from the public schools of this State," and the New Jersey act rather lackadaisically that "no religious exercise shall be permitted except reading the Bible." These did not embody the proper philosophy and spirit at all. So Georgia led in 1921 with a law which had teeth in it. There followed Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Kentucky, Maine, North Dakota, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and Tennessee.

All these new laws have high-toned preambles. "To insure greater security in the faith of our fathers," recites the Maine law, "to inculcate into the lives of the rising generation the spiritual values necessary to the well-being of our and future civilizations, to develop those high moral and religious principles essential to human happiness, to make available to the youth of our land the book which has been the inspiration of the greatest masterpieces of literature, art and music and which has been the strength of the great men of the Christian Era, there shall be in all the public schools of the State, daily or at suitable intervals, readings from the Scriptures with special emphasis upon the Ten Commandments, the Psalms of David, the Proverbs of Solomon, the Sermon on the Mount and the Lord's Prayer." The Florida and Kentucky laws reason that "it is to the interest of good moral training, and of a life of honorable thought and good citizenship, that the public school children should have lessons of morality brought to their attention during their school days." Teachers who neglect to comply with the law may be dismissed and in Kentucky their pay may be withheld. Lest compliance be perfunctory, even the number of verses is prescribed in many of the laws. The doses, allopathic or homeopathic, are as follows: in Delaware, at least five verses; in Idaho, twelve to twenty verses; in Georgia, at least one chapter; in Tennessee, at least ten verses. A wide acquaintance with the Book is further assured in Tennessee by forbidding the reading of the same chapter more than twice during the same session.

II

Sage as this particular provision is, and meticulous as is its draughtsmanship, on the whole, the Bible laws are very carelessly drawn. It is a familiar fact, alas, that many portions of the Holy Book are lewd, lascivious, indecent and obscene. In fact, there are judicial decisions which establish this: they are compiled in Theodore Schroeder's "Obscene Literature and Constitutional Law" and show that in several instances matter has been barred from the mails as obscene which turned out on examination to be compilations of Bible quotations. As the new laws stand, it would be perfectly legal for a jocose schoolma'am to undermine the morals of her charges by frequently reading to them the Song of Solomon, for instance. Before it is too late, then, let the laws be amended to add a clause, "provided, however, that nothing in this act contained shall be taken to excuse the encouragement of licentiousness."

When the telephone came into general use, little did we realize that there was a defect in our laws. We had laws against using indecent language, but did they apply to the citizen who swore when the operator gave him the wrong number? At an early date, the lawgivers of North Dakota awoke. In 1907, they penalized the utterance of indecent language over the telephone. Now Texas has hastened to fall into line, and has enacted this North Dakota resolve ipsissimis verbis. The phonograph was invented, and several of the Mid-Western States similarly passed laws against playing lascivious compositions on this new instrument of Satan. Even now, in one of our great agricultural empires, a corn-belt Solon must be knitting his legislative brows as he sits drafting a bill to protect the endangered morals of his constituents from the radio.

In the Nineteenth Century the callow youth bent on sowing his wild oats lacked an accessory which the high-stepper now finds indispensable. I refer naturally to the taxicab—the sine qua non of up-to-date hot love. One may now be transported speedily and expeditiously to the night-club, to the house of joy, to the little love nest. For a number of years the taxicab drivers plied their nefarious trade unmolested. But if they continue to do so today, it is under the pains and penalties of law. There has been a Movement. The result has been what may properly be called a standard Anti-Transportation for Immoral Purposes Law. It is on the books in Delaware, Louisiana, Maine, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Wisconsin. It commands the driver to keep his eyes open. If he knows, or has reason to suspect, that his passenger has a rendezvous, he must tell him politely but firmly to walk. In short, the law strikes the evil at its source. It makes the taxi-driver a guardian of the public morals!

When Satan, too, encompassed the adoption of Woman's Suffrage, little did the average American suspect its threat to our ancient standards of decency. But as soon as they were enfranchised, women began to be admitted to jury duty, and many States even made this service compulsory.

Alas, the feminists had overlooked most of the existing State laws with respect to the custody and conduct of juries! They provided that if a jury did not agree without retiring, an officer had to be sworn to keep its members together in a private place and not permit any person to communicate with them nor do so himself. Once the case was submitted to them and they were ushered into the jury-room, no bailiff could disturb them. One does not need more than the moral sense of a Fiji Islander to suspect what goings-on there could be behind those stolid doors. Mixed juries! God only knew how many good women and true would be ruined. Moreover, how could their partners in guilt be taken when the law made it impossible to burst into the den of vice? Obviously, the jury-room threatened to become as favorite a place of assignation as the grotto of the nymphs. California, in 1919, was the first State to solve this delicate problem. A clause was added to its jury law, thus:

provided, however, that when the jury is composed of both men and women, in the event that it shall become necessary to retire for the night, the women must be kept in a room or rooms separate and apart from the men.

Thus, when the shades of night fell, the husbands of California suffragists were no longer made cuckolds. Pennsylvania followed in 1921, Kentucky in 1922, and North Dakota in 1923. What of the other States? The blot, alas, is still upon their scutcheons. Here is a cause for the Watch and Ward Society!

But there is now far more legislation than ever before against all the ancient and customary vices. Its broad aspects are familiar, but one often encounters quite new ideas. Examining the State Prohibition acts, for example, one concludes that Volstead was a novice. Padlocks, forsooth! After all, perhaps not too much is to be expected of a pioneer. What chance has a scofflaw in Colorado or Iowa? It is there enacted that the attempt to destroy any liquid while an officer of the law is making a search is prima facie evidence that it is intoxicating. The Alabama drys have turned the penological clock back whole decades: in Alabama a judge is forbidden ever to suspend sentence in a case of liquor violation! In Kentucky, which has, perhaps, the most savage Prohibition law of any State, the general reputation of the accused for bootlegging may be proved—thus disposing of an immemorial rule of evidence. The Kentucky law also tries to convert every citizen into a spy and informer. It offers a standing reward of $50 to any person furnishing information leading to the arrest and conviction of a bootlegger. Oregon, going further, has resolved to make Prohibition pay its own way: all fines collected in liquor cases go into a special fund to be used for paying the salaries of snouters. It is still a mooted question if Congress under the Eighteenth Amendment may make it criminal to purchase intoxicating liquor, but in 1923 Maine amended its conspiracy law to make it criminal for two or more persons, as buyers and sellers, to conspire to bring about a sale of liquor in the State. Thus, in that great State, the man who buys a finger of Scotch even for his own use is guilty of a criminal conspiracy, and has foisted upon him all the odious associations which Anglo-Saxon law has always attached to that crime. In North Dakota, one may not sell even vinegar or syrup “under circumstances from which the seller may reasonably deduce an intention on the part of the purchaser to use the same for beverage purposes.” The circumspection with which many of the laws enumerate forbidden means of liquor transportation is quite amusing: Indiana singles out the airplane, North Dakota the buggy, Iowa the suitcase. In Texas all confiscated liquor must be delivered to the State Board of Control for use in eleemosynary institutions, to which, under the terms of an old law, the State must supply spiritus frumenti.

With the laws against adulterating liquor we come upon the sad (and inescapable) dilemma of Prohibition. At first glance these laws appear to be bulwarks of dryness. Merely to adulterate liquor with poisonous ingredients is made a felony if fatal results follow. To leave the bootlegger to the ordinary penal law is frequently to let him escape almost entirely. But upon closer scrutiny, it must be evident that to make his carelessness manslaughter and murder is only to encourage him to manufacture good stuff. In Florida, Illinois, Oklahoma and Tennessee, if the drinker dies, the seller or dispenser is a murderer. In Iowa he is guilty of manslaughter. In Tennessee, even if the drink is ignorantly given, the crime is manslaughter.

The Demon Rum is thus legally laid, but the Demon Nicotine is still in the saddle. Most of the States, for a long time now, have had laws against the sale of cigarettes to minors, but in the last few years several have introduced absolute tobacco prohibition. Apparently the Nineteenth Amendment is on its way. Idaho, North Dakota and Utah have passed such tobacco prohibition laws, but have had to repeal them. Kansas, Arkansas, and South Dakota, however, having done the good work, remain as adamant. Undoubtedly the obstinate resistance to liquor prohibition is tending to save the weed. But one of the results of the new crusade is to make it illegal to smoke in public restaurants in Nebraska, Idaho and North Dakota. In North Dakota cigarettes may not be advertised. The law of Idaho generously permits patrons of public restaurants to smoke, but only in the toilet-rooms thereof. The Christians who had to take to the catacombs had a comparatively pleasant time of it.

The evils of the pool-room are beginning to keep our Christian lawgivers awake as never before. Alabama, Georgia, Iowa, Mississippi and Ohio are in the list. The license fees are growing larger and the regulations ever more burdensome. The Georgia law even prohibits baseball tickers in pool-rooms. The laws commonly require the interiors of all pool-rooms to be so arranged as to furnish a clear and unobstructed view from the street. I quote one: "No billiard-room shall permit any screens, curtains, blinds, partitions or other obstructions to be used to prevent a clear view of the interior, which clear view must be maintained at all times. No partitions forming rooms, stalls or other enclosures shall be permitted." Fortunately, for the necessities of nature, the law continues: "This provision, however, shall not be construed to prohibit the maintenance of wash-rooms and toilet-rooms for proper purposes, nor the maintenance of closets for storing purposes exclusively." The pool-room laws also exhibit another dilemma of the righteous. The Y. M. C. A. fights the devil with his own weapons, and the Y. M. C. A.'s have excellent pool-rooms. What to do? The Georgia and Mississippi laws specifically exempt Y. M. C. A. pool-rooms from their Christian operation.

The regulation of carnivals is another new field for wowsers. In the language of one of the recent laws a carnival is defined as an aggregation of persons which "attracts attendance and causes promiscuous commingling of persons in a spirit of merrymaking and revelry." Idaho began in 1921 by legislating them out of existence entirely. "Travelling carnival companies," the law decreed, "are hereby forbidden from operating in the State of Idaho." If they entered the State, their property was subject to confiscation. Merry-go-rounds and such innocent amusements, however, were exempted. In 1923, three other States, Minnesota, North Dakota and Vermont, followed suit, but contented themselves with regulation only. In 1925, Minnesota amended its law to exclude carnivals from within one mile of villages. A special feature of the North Dakota law is that it bans the dancing of the hootchie-kootchie.

There have been hundreds of town and city ordinances regulating dance-halls, but in the last five years five sovereign States have taken a hand. Chapters and verses are as follows: Minnesota: L. 1923, Ch. 136; North Dakota: L. 1925, Ch. 128; South Dakota: L. 1921, Ch. 334; Washington: L. 1923, Ch. 111; Wisconsin: L. 1925, Ch. 66. All dance-halls are required to obtain State permits. The age of admission is generally eighteen. A policeman must be present at every dance, and in Wisconsin private committees selected by the county boards are clothed with the powers of deputy sheriffs. Of course, all dances "characterized by immodest motions of the body" are forbidden. But the pet of these lawgivers is the bright lights clause. "Every public dancing-place," reads the Minnesota law, "shall be brightly illuminated while in public use, and dancing therein while the lights are extinguished, dimmed or turned low so as to give imperfect illumination is prohibited." The law stops short of prescribing the number of watts. However, the South Dakota law stipulates that not only the dance-hall but the adjoining grounds must be brightly illuminated.

III

The prevailing practice in the happy past was to permit the separate townships, villages and cities to regulate such things in the exercise of their police powers. The State laws merely formulated their charter powers, and in general terms penalized indecent and immoral conduct and acts. The municipalities enjoyed thus a form of local option as to sin. But now we move steadily toward State-wide laws in that department. They show an increase of political efficacy in the rural districts, which are bent on making the urban Babylons bow to their wills, and are put over by the same tactics which led first to State-wide, and then to national Prohibition. Consider, for instance, the Kentucky law of 1922, entitled grandiloquently "An Act Prohibiting the Appearance of Persons Clothed Only in Bathing Costumes upon the Public Highways of this Commonwealth or upon the Streets of Towns or Villages having no Police Protection":

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

1: That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to appear on any highway or upon the streets of any town or village having no police protection when such person or persons are clothed only in ordinary bathing garb.

2: Any person violating the provisions of this Act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined in any sum not less than $5 nor more than $25 for each and every offence.

The more remote Christian villages have had such ordinances for years, but this is the first time State lawgivers, endowed with mileage privileges, mahogany swivel-chairs, and frock coats, have spoken thus in the grand manner.

The most marked characteristic of the latest moral legislation is its great specialization. In the old days, the moral laws lacked precision. They spoke vaguely of the "lewd, lascivious, indecent, and obscene." They hardly amounted to more than a warning to be good. Sinful men objected to them because they created constructive offences, but the righteous were equally dissatisfied, for under them many of the wicked escaped altogether. Now they are being refined in a way which amounts to creating new crimes. One of these new offences is peeping. Three States, Indiana, Georgia, and Michigan, have adopted Peeping Tom acts. Indiana was in the vanguard in 1917, and Georgia followed in 1919, and Michigan in 1923. The Indiana law is worth scrutinizing in full:

1: It shall be unlawful for any person to peep or to attempt to peep or to go upon the enclosed or unenclosed land of another with intent then and there to peep into the residence, lodging-room, lodging-house, or rooming-house of another person, which said residence, lodging-room, lodging-house, or rooming-house is then and there occupied.

2: "Peep" defined: The word "peep" as used in Section 1 of this Act shall mean any looking of a clandestine, surreptitious, prying or secretive nature.

Obviously detectives and Prohibition agents come within the fair scope of this act. All looking of a "clandestine" nature is prohibited. Some fair day an Indianan wet or damp may yet invoke the law against a Prohibition snouter. That this is not a fanciful eventuality is, indeed, shown by the Georgia Peeping Tom Act, to which the canny lawmakers added:

3: Be it further Enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That nothing in this Act shall prevent duly constituted officers of the law from performing their official duties in ferreting out offenders or suspected offenders against the law, or in secretly watching a person suspected of violating the laws of the State of Georgia.

If the old maxim of the Common Law, that legislation is presumed to be designed to remedy an existing evil, is true, then the Republic is obviously full of degraded and lascivious degenerates. What confronts us is a legislative mind undermined by prurency and comstockery, and finding relief in barnyard legislation. Much of it is almost unmentionable. All of it is unenforceable. There are numerous laws against making obscene marks or drawings on water-closets. How is the adolescent to be detected save by a snooping Goodman hiding in the very châlet de nécessité? To judge by the laws relating to manufacturing establishments in such States as Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Iowa, Minnesota, Nevada, and Wisconsin, this châlet de nécessité, when carelessly built, is contributing wholesale to the downfall of the Younger Generation. Where both sexes are employed the Minnesota law, for instance, requires:

The outside partitions of all toilet-rooms shall be of solid construction and may be opaque and translucent but not transparent, and shall extend from floor to ceiling, or such rooms shall be independently ceiled over. All partitions separating toilet-rooms provided for the different sexes shall be constructed of such materials as are not transparent or translucent and they shall be sound-proof and no openings in such partitions shall be permitted.

The anti-gambling laws are achieving such high perfection that in Texas it is now definitely forbidden to bet on a game of dominoes or to match pennies. And the State censorship laws are going so far that in South Dakota it is unlawful to exhibit scenes "illustrating illicit love, infidelity in family relations, or striking an officer of the law." In Idaho, there is a recent law against joy-riding, and another called the Lazy Husbands Law. In Louisiana, there is a law against unauthorized persons entering the premises of State schools where dormitories for women are maintained. Another State contributes a statute making it unlawful to hang or exhibit paintings of the nude "except in an art gallery."

Three new statutes, all relating to censorship, are so notable as to merit close examination. Perhaps the most interesting is the inspiration of Mississippi: L. 1922, Ch. 265. To the text:

1: Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi: That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to keep for sale, offer for sale, or sell any magazine or other publication which has been excluded from the United States mail on account of its vulgar, indecent or obscene character.

2: That any person, firm or corporation, or any agent of any person, firm or corporation shall upon conviction of violation of Section 1 hereof be subject to a fine not less than ten dollars nor more than one hundred dollars or imprisonment to exceed thirty days or both. Each day said magazine or publication shall be kept for sale or sold shall constitute a separate offence.

Imagine the moral exaltation of the author of this law from the moment he conceived it, breathed his fierce vow, to the moment of his final triumph in committee! Did he encounter the objection from a skeptical colleague that he was sponsoring a supererogatory act—that it was rather difficult to send in magazines through the mails after the Postmaster General had once excluded them, that if anyone did it he made himself liable to a maximum penalty of ten years in a Federal penitentiary, or a ten thousand dollar fine or both, and that therefore the people of Mississippi were reasonably safe? If these arguments were heard, they had no effect. A copy of an obscene magazine might still find its way into the State by ox-cart, so the law was passed.

Minnesota goes even further in a law of last year. Thus:

Any person who as an individual or as a member of a firm or association or organization, or as officer or director, member or employé of a corporation shall be engaged in the business of regularly or customarily producing, publishing or circulating, having in possession, selling or giving away

(a) An obscene, lewd, and lascivious newspaper, magazine, or other periodical, or,

(b) A malicious, scandalous and defamatory newspaper, magazine, or other periodical, is guilty of a nuisance and all persons guilty of such nuisance may be enjoined as hereinafter provided.

Any participation in the business at all, even to the extent of holding a share of stock, renders any person subject to the injunction procedure prescribed. The Attorney General is directed to bring the action, but if he neglects to do so any individual smut-hound may act as his substitute. After a hearing, the court may forbid altogether the further publication of the offending periodical:

After trial the court may make its order and judgment permanently enjoining any and all defendants found guilty of violating this act.

This law summarily destroys an unpopular paper without any of the safeguards of the normal criminal trial. It illustrates above all the fascination which analogy has for the weak-minded. In its early stages even the vice crusaders recognized the injunction as so extraordinary and exceptional a remedy as to justify its application only to the most formidable evils. But then William S. Kenyon, then a district attorney and now a Federal judge, popularized it in Iowa as a means of harassing women in the red light districts, and it spread like wild fire through all the Methodist Middle West. Now only six American States are without the benefit of injunction abatement procedure against houses of ill-fame. To the accomplishment of this end the so-called American Social Hygiene Association worked tirelessly. From drink and prostitution the injunction in the last few years has been extended to gambling, and even to cigarette selling, as in the Dakotas. In 1923, Colorado passed a law for the padlocking of lunch-rooms, soft-drink parlors, dance-halls, hotels or even groceries run "in such a manner as to disturb the neighbors." Now, in the fulness of time, we have the Minnesota law. Such is moral progress!

Finally, let the lawgivers of little Delaware enter the competition. One of the demands which the rustic pastors of the land are beginning to make is to be shielded against the contumely of the ungodly. They resent the unkind criticism to which they are subjected by irreverent wits. At the 1923 session of the Legislature of Delaware this demand produced an Act to Prohibit the Exhibition of Any Moving Pictures that Ridicule Religion or a Minister of the Gospel:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Delaware in General Assembly met:

It shall be unlawful for any person or any officer, or employé of any corporation engaged in the business of exhibiting moving-pictures to exhibit any picture that holds up to ridicule religion, or religious matters, or to exhibit a minister of the Gospel as a ridiculous person.

Delaware, so far, is the only State to enact this law. But many others, you may be sure, are preparing to follow.

RED-HOT SELLING

BY WILLIAM WEIMAR

TIME was, in the idyllic days of our forefathers, when any fellow of grade-school erudition, free of halitosis, a cleft palate and religious doubt, might look forward in simple faith to a successful career as a salesman, or as the term then was, a drummer. Given a mileage book and a case of samples, he was admonished only to plug everlastingly at it. If he did so he was sure to win through eventually to an honored place in the home office and a competence ample for his simple needs. So all the Babbitts of 1885 were made; so they got their high blood-pressure.

But not today, in the merciless shambles of modern commercial strife. Successful selling, one learns from even a brief reading of the prophets, is now become a mysterious business, comparable to lion-taming or self-induced catalepsy. The Prospect, the buyer, is viewed no longer merely as a man with whom business may conceivably be done: he is instead treated as a laboratory animal on which an operation—and a peculiarly delicate operation—is to be performed. Worse, the victim is found, not strapped conveniently on the table, but free and snarling defiance from behind the slop jars of the operating theatre. Trickery therefore becomes necessary: the beast must be lured to its doom; and psychology, by the unanimous vote of scientists, is the bait. "Selling is psychological—it exists under the hair." The quotation is from "Selling Slants," by George F. Abbott, a name that, recalling the realtor of Zenith, I hail as almost too good to be true.

But true or not, Br'er Abbott states the leitmotif with all the glory of the full brass choir, and then at once, directing the blast upon the trembling novice, imparts the ultimate secret of success:

He should firmly believe in himself, he should believe he is a big man. If he believes this, he is going to TALK BIG—ACT BIG—and in consequence sooner or later, his results WILL BE BIG.

He should go through a course of self-hypnotism so far as business is concerned, and in this manner he will rid himself of one of the devils in this business—FEAR.

Under the title, Salesmanship, the New York Public Library lists 300 books, including a collection of character-building letters written by ten successful salesmen to salesmen who had not been doing very well. There are also "Come; Let Us Walk Together," a series of inspirational editorials from the Sporting Goods Salesman and other periodicals, and tomes on such subtle aspects as the Approach, the Delineation or Exposition and the all-important Close.

Herr Freud and his school, emerged at length from below Twelfth street, are now taken up, threadbare though they be, by the medicine men of trade; and the newsstands cater to popular demand by displaying alongside such salesmen's staples as Art Lover, Paris Nights, Arts, Fads, Modes, and similar æsthetic works, that great organ of enlightenment, Psychology. In a recent issue of this inspiring monthly one finds, among numberless advertisements of will power builders and keys to hypnotism, a long moan for the passing of M. Coué, "A Straight Talk on the Cardinal Principles of Salesmanship—as Applied to Business, Marriage, the Professions—and LIFE," "What Is Somno-Therapy?" "Some Facts About the Thyroid Gland," "The Psychology of Passion," with photographs of the choruses of "Great Temptations" and "Passions of 1926," and "Psychology in the News."

Imagine the ex-shipping clerk, fed on such manna, fixing a steely eye on a contumacious Prospect and playing on the fellow's fears, passions and cravings for gain! God save me, I tried it myself in a day gone by. Full of hope, at the close of the late unpleasantness, I abandoned my youthful body and brain to a study of the science in all its ramifications, including mesmerism and ghost dances. It was a long, hard struggle, but a time came at length when I went forth, the very apotheosis of the peddler. The way had been prepared; the firm whose goods I carried into the bleak tundras of New England was known, although it had, during the war, devoted itself almost exclusively to wholesale transactions. Furthermore, once upon the road, I found the boss had spoken in truth: the stock actually was more extensive than my competitors'; moreover, our prices were right, and business flourished in that lush prelude to the doldrums of 1920. I prepared myself for a killing.

But something was wrong. The choice plums went elsewhere, in many cases to such of my rivals as I definitely knew could offer neither our assortments nor our quotations. In despair I reviewed my technique. Plainly I had not profited from my studies to the extent that I had hoped and believed. And so, from Hartford to Framingham, I gave my nights to theory and my days to putting that theory into practice. But in vain. At the Lenox, in Boston, a telegram implored me in the name of God to return to New York. Feeling sure that the end of things was at hand, I obeyed, only to find that the boss, though he broke out no old brandy to celebrate the homecoming, intended to retain my services for a go at the territory around New York. Pleased at the prospect, I gave myself to a further scrutiny of the texts and to forays upon the trade.

II

On a sultry afternoon that made of Long Island City a sweltering grotto, I paid my respects to a small, wattled member of a race that a few months before had been the target for Allied high explosives and the verbal assaults of the Great Moral Denunciator in Washington. No, he was positively not in the market. No! But my name interested him: I had come perhaps out of Thuringia? Not so far as I knew. Nuremberg was most often spoken of at home. Nuremberg! Der hell you say! And I was treated to the performance of a high pressure American booster doing his stuff in a make-up and dialogue reminiscent of Fourteenth street burlesque. Old post cards came from dusty pigeonholes. Fleischbrücke zu Nürnberg, Frauentor zu Nürnberg, Am Tiergärtnerort zu Nürnberg.

"And the Lebkuchen"! I interposed. "We have not had any since 1913."

Lieber Gott, the Lebkuchen! He was crying now, and I thought best to change the subject. What an afternoon for a Seidel of that Kulmbacher taken from us by the children of light!

Instantly he flamed into righteous anger. Together we denounced such a Schweinerei, and from Prohibition to the Fourteen Points was a transition logical enough. The long afternoon waned. It was time I was in the office, reporting another fruitless day. To linger here was a waste of time so far as business was concerned. The boss, I recalled, held grave doubts as to the possibility of anyone wooing this fat account from the house that had retained it for years. And I had not had opportunity to so much as mention my goods. There was little nourishment in merely listening politely while an old man wistfully spoke of a Fatherland that existed only in his golden memories. The last funeral cortege, returning dust-covered from Calvary, vanished into the sunset behind the Bridge. I rose to pack my stock. Then, of a sudden, came the sweet words:

"How much you're asking for those?"

At 5.30, bearing an order that Herr Krausmeyer, his stenographers gone for the day, had written out in his own angular script, I sat in a B. M. T. train, figuring the commission. One hundred and fifty-six dollars and eleven cents. And I had not, for so much as a single instant, cast upon him the Evil Eye nor attempted even my most elementary exorcisms. Business had been done, and a very fair day's business, merely because I had remembered the embossed tin boxes that contained certain cakes suitable only for use as missiles in some deplorable Weihnachts affray. A strange basis, I thought, for a commercial transaction of some importance with a fellow reputed a very hard-headed business man!

Pondering the subject on the way home, I began to doubt the Black Magic on which so much stress was laid. I recalled the significant impatience with which the boss had always dismissed my attempts to go deeply into the more technical aspects of our line: invariably the conversation, by transitions hardly apposite, was turned to art. The neophyte, couchant at the feet of the successful trader and bent on complete knowledge of his craft, was vouchsafed no more than a repetition of elements ere the master escaped by a headlong dive into Impressionism. Once he had found that I knew the Barbizon School to be something other than an institution for teaching languages through the use of phonograph records, he bestowed the kiss and, despite my failure to garner profits in the two months of my labors, saw to it that my salary went on and even was slightly raised. Together we visited the Metropolitan and other galleries, and once, with doors barricaded against the Philistines in the outer offices, we attempted charcoal sketches of our tall and austere neighbor, the Bush Building.

It was a queer proceeding and one hardly calculated to raise the morale of the sales force. That such things went on in the hard and merciless world of business was shocking to my ideals. Did the boss see in me great possibilities as a future reaper in the fields? Did he believe, because I had heard of Monet and could make a stab at pronouncing the name of Cézanne, that such glittering erudition would beguile prospects into surrendering their accounts? It seemed incredible, yet there was in the advertisements of many culture courses impressive testimony for the confusion of such as might scoff at the idea. Perhaps he suspected that I gave my every spare twenty minutes to a perusal of gems of the world's wisdom and whole evenings to the Five Foot Shelf. Perhaps he merely found in our talks momentary escape from the intolerable boredom of his business life—and was willing to pay for such means of escaping. I do not know.

But after the pleasant adventure on Long Island there began to glow about the matters of cold and sober commerce a genial light revealing a multitude of details, bizarre and rich in amusement. I perceived that, other things being by no means equal, orders went to the fellow who could most persuasively share with the buyer a compelling interest in horse-shoe pitching, zoömorphism or the breeding of Lady Amherst pheasants. Business then, like all life, swarmed with desires for refuge, for a little glitter to relieve the dreadful monotony of the drudge.

Well, it was assuredly a matter to keep in mind. That evening with appropriate ceremonies I burned the gospels, and thereafter harried the metropolitan trade with heartening results. The experience led to an emphatic conclusion: the hawker of wares is best advised to forswear all attempts at psychic control. Let him rather collect for future use a store of miscellaneous information, not necessarily true, for he will deal with men susceptible to the traditional fallacies, men to whom a brand-new idea may seem so disturbing that a retreat into cold, shocked silence will be their inevitable reaction. For myself, once I had abjured the rôle of amateur swami, I found business coming my way. I sold because it chanced that I had once lived in Montreal, because I had been introduced to Alla Nazimova, because as a child, in 1908, I had seen that ball game wherein Merkle failed to touch second. Whenever, indeed, I could strike upon a subject that offered the yawning purchasing gent a moment's respite from his humdrum life of unit costs, the sun of his favor shone upon me and was reflected gloriously upon my goods.

I did business in Worcester because I was the ingenuous boy to a wistful Babbitt with no offspring. In Bridgeport, remembrance that my grandfather had served with Anthony Comstock in the Seventeenth Connecticut Volunteers, put me right with an ardent Frau Lieutenant Colonel of the G. A. R.—and consequently with her husband. In Philadelphia, the tale of Bismarck, the phenomenal police dog, and his master's gloves did the trick. (Incidentally the only instance I can recall where the legendary device of the salesman's questionable story was employed.)

Inevitably, of course, I met specimens directly out of cold storage; fellows seemingly intent only on dollars and cents. One such aloof edelweiss, blooming coldly in Providence, R. I., was interested, I found after almost a year's research, in mathematical puzzles. Realizing my own hopeless inability to meet the man with his chosen weapons, I compromised by mailing to him a mass of brain-searing problems. A month later I found him haggard, almost insane, but yet strong enough to repulse my advances. Six months of siege laid at long distance brought capitulation: he purchased, paying with many an ugly curse a little more for grades of material that shortly afterward brought him to my throat with the accusation that I had, for some strange reason or other, wilfully kept him from buying such goods sooner. . . .

III

Now, retired from active service at the front, I loll in the boss's atelier, and sally forth only when particularly dirty work is to be done. Then the prospect who is also a golfer hears of what was almost an ace on the twelfth at Greenwich; the bug on diet learns that meat may be bolted without actual harm; the advocate of Prohibition for labor gets his two quarts of Dewar's—and not infrequently business is done.

Business? Business! Then I am the Little Father of all the Russias!

VARIETY

BY HUGH KENT

AN AMERICAN newspaper man in Paris was sued for divorce. A tabloid weekly theatrical newspaper, published in New York, and filled with ugly type, heavy black advertisements and the most atrocious English ever put into print, was named as co-respondent by his wife. She said that when the paper arrived every week, her husband did not speak to her during the two days required to read it from cover to cover. The Paris court record shows that the suit was withdrawn on the understanding that the husband should cancel his subscription to the paper. It was Variety.

Variety's grammar is barbarous; its style is original and unique and completely independent of any other writing; its phraseology is wild and revolutionary and its diction is the result of miscegenation among shop talk, slang, Broadway colloquialisms, sporting neologisms and impatient short-cutting. Variety's other name is Sime Silverman, owner, editor, bowels and soul of the sheet. Sime, as he signs himself, and as he is known up and down Broadway, had the usual experiences of the adventurous youth who leaves home before his first shave. He saw a little of everything, playing cards for the house in an up-State gambling joint at seventeen, and finally coming to the big city, where he settled on the alluring outskirts of the theatrical business. About twenty years ago he got a job reporting theatrical news for the Morning Telegraph, then the Bible of the showman and the sugar of Broadway's coffee. He and a reporter who knew nothing about Broadway went to work the same day. The managing editor conceived the idea of pitting the newcomers against each other, keeping the better one and discharging the other. Sime countered by pooling his stories with the other fellow and so they always managed to break even on honors. But it did not last long, for he was soon fired.

He took his new reporter friend with him, borrowed $2500 and started Variety. He was bankrupt at the end of the first week, and at the end of every other week for months, but he kept on borrowing and scraping until finally the property began to breathe. He staked its claim to existence on printing all the facts about the show world, and, because he has never varied from that programme, he still has to borrow and scrape. He has been in battles that lasted for years—with the Shuberts, with the B. F. Keith vaudeville interests, and with other powerful foes. There is peace for a space, and then comes a time when Sime must choose between suppressing what he regards as news, and doing battle. Invariably the choice is battle. At present he is fighting both the Shuberts and the Keith-Albee vaudeville. He has waged an almost endless fight against all the big theatrical interests, not to reform anybody, for he is not an up-lifter, but simply to preserve his editorial independence. He doesn't like it because it costs him lots of money and time, but the only way he knows how to run a paper is to have it completely free—a novelty in theatrical journalism. His advertisers pay for every agate line they get and they are never given puffs as lagniappe. An advertiser may take a page to give a message to the trade, and in the same issue, and perhaps on the facing page, Sime will call him a liar and expose his villainy.

In the trade paper field, editorial men, if not actually soliciting advertising, usually work hand in glove with or directly under the advertising department. But Sime will not allow his solicitors even to speak to his reporters, and the former, who bring in the payroll money each week, are treated more like orphans than like the saviors they are commonly held to be on other papers. Most trade papers are rotten with subsidy, and those that aren't are at the mercy of the press agents who work under the men who buy advertising space. But Variety recently printed a warning to press agents that if they tried to bribe the paper with advertising their advertisements would be thrown out.

Every page of the sheet reflects Sime's peculiar courage. The bugaboo of libel doesn't seem to interest him at all. If he thinks a story is true he prints it, and the victim can choose the weapons, time and place. One week a man will be reported quite casually as "hop head"; the next you may read that "John Doe isn't a dope addict as reported. John says he hasn't hit the stuff in years." That ends it. The paper is completely devoid of sentimentality. It never says that "So-and-so's death came as a great shock to his many friends, etc." It simply says that he died—and it tells the cause, even if that cause was dope, drink, or the most scandalous of diseases.

When Aimée McPherson, the Los Angeles evangelist, was "abducted," Sime printed a story from an old circus man who remembered her in the days when she was a sideshow announcer. He pointed out that the only way a voice could be trained like Mrs. McPherson's was by experience as a carnival barker. "Plenty of indications of smart showmanship in the entire affair," the story concluded. The Eucharistic Congress was a "flop," according to Variety. "But the Moose and Elks conventions are in the offing," it remarked consolingly, "and maybe the lodge boys will be better buyers." It covered the last Fourth of July celebrations by reporting the resorts that "put on a heavy gyp and grift" i.e., one-sided gambling devices, three-shell tricks, etc.

Sime's staff loves him like a father and has an almost fanatical faith in him. One of his men, when asked about him, admitted that he didn't know much, but added that "he is the greatest God-damned editor that ever lived"—and his eyes were full of tears as he said it. Another, who had been fired nine times in fifteen years for getting too drunk to function, but who always came back, said: "Listen, kid, Sime's a right — — —, and the squarest-shooting guy Broadway ever saw!" Silverman pays his men well, loves them much, and works them hard.

II

Beside being its editor, he is the star reporter of his own sheet. For years he has lunched in the Astor Hotel hunting-room, which, since Prohibition, has taken the place of the old Knickerbocker Bar as the headquarters of theatrical business men. There is always a crowd at his table and dozens stop to chat as they pass. If anyone has a bit of news, Sime gets it. He is known also at the night clubs, where he spends several nights a week. Here, too, there is always a crowd at his table, and the party and the drinks are always on him. He can drink like a fish and never lose his head. Once, when a man in a club accused Sime of being drunk, it made him violently angry. "Think so?" he sneered. "If you do, let's go upstairs, and you can make some easy money playing me cards at a thousand a crack." The story is that he broke his man. His wide-open game of poker has earned respect along Broadway. He is continually making the rounds, always the reporter first. He seems steeled to days and nights of that wearing life, with little sleep; he has stood it for more than half his own days. He has an apartment over his office where he sometimes sleeps, or spends a whole night alone grinding out sentimental ballads on an old player piano.

More than one editor has wondered how Sime makes all his men write alike, in a dialect never encountered anywhere else. The fact is that that dialect is simply the slang of Broadway. Its colorful expressions are those of its readers and its viewpoint is strictly that of hard-boiled New York. The show business isn't interested in the niceties of grammar and syntax, or in the proper use of words, and neither is Sime. His paper would not be so interesting and valuable to its readers if it were written in decent English. They would get less information from the news that "Joe Dokes lost one thousand dollars on the production of 'Watch My Dust'" than they get out of "Joe Dokes went for a grand on 'Dust'."

Silverman probably knows very well that his paper sets a world's record for bad English. Once he bought an encyclopedia and an unabridged dictionary for his staff, on the instalment plan. A year later he discovered that not one of the volumes had ever been opened and so he gave them away. Newspaper reporters often sing out to their neighbors "Two c's or two s's in occasion?," but on Variety they merely write what they guess to be right and let the proof-reader correct it or pass it. They are busy pouring facts into the sheet: what do they care about spelling?

The same nonconforming spirit is evident in every detail of the paper. The signatures on its reviews of performances are set in italic at the end, and run to such forms as Con, Abel, Fred, Sisk, Hal, Ung, Ibee, Loop, Edda, and Skig. They are made up of Christian names, of syllables of surnames, and of nicknames. On the woman's page is a department called "The Dressy Side," dealing with the advanced styles that stage women affect; it is "By The Skirt." There is a series of gossipy departments labeled "Inside Stuff," with a subsidiary line naming the field: music, vaudeville, legit, pictures or "outside," the latter meaning outdoor amusements.

The text runs true to the promise of the heading. There is a column called "Literati," dealing with writers for the stage, and setting forth the current rumors and gossip concerning them.

The headlines have the same tempo and fresh looseness as the text. A story dealing with the ruin of many shows in New Orleans carried the head: "That N. O. Can Knock 'Em Off—Town Seems to Think More of Carbohic Acid." Over the report of a theatre's display of pictures of naked women was the caption: "Salacious Limit." When the play, "Bunk of 1926," was in trouble, the headline was: "Bunk is Sunk, Loss, Net, $60,000." Such captions as "Boston Biz Fair—1 Hit, 1 Flop" are common. Every reader along Broadway knows that "Lemon Stands Don't Interest Ride Men" means that poor-paying amusement parks fail to attract operators of roller-coasters, chute-the-chutes and carousels.

The show business itself is rich in colorful words and phraseology. Variety's staff has adopted all of them naturally and to them it has added its own fantastic coinages. Some of them are quite beyond a layman's understanding. Words are drawn from the brothel, the race track and bootlegging, the latter having contributed McCoy, meaning genuine. Ordinary slang is often put between quotation marks, but Variety's own assaults on sound English are used with perfect naïveté. Sime himself lately wrote that a new moving picture bored the men in the house, but that "the flaps and mams seemed to enjoy it."

One of the paper's coinages should be officially embraced by the dictionary and bred into the language. It refers to a flattering, enthusiastic review by a sycophantic critic as a rave. This trick of exchanging nouns and verbs is also exemplified in the report that a certain man "authored the show, which will be readied next Fall, when it will be boked up [from bokum]." In referring to money wagered by persons with good tips or information, the term used is smart money. Motion pictures which are ground out wholesale by the studios at the rate of one a week are called quickies. Songs rendered with an illustrating slide are ill songs. A conspicuous success is an outstander. Motion picture theatres with continuous showings and no intermissions are grind houses. The word ritziest, when used to describe an act, connotes tolerant contempt, as if to say: "Well, some people will like it, but it isn't good show business." If an act is good showmanship and also superior in tone and dress, Variety takes it to its heart with warmth and reports it as classy.

III

The master of all American slang writers is probably John Conway, a former member of the Giants, who wrote sports for a time between deserting the diamond and joining Variety. His slang is thoroughly natural and without it he would be dumb. Here is a sample of his criticism:

After intermission, Helen Eley, a real big league singing comedienne with unusually good bright material, whammed them, assisted by a male pianist who cops the pale blue pajamas for failing to do a piano solo. That alone stamps Miss Eley as knowing her onions. She is a flaming flamboyant blonde with oceans of stuff.

Faber and Wales next bowled them with a meritorious crossfire turn founded on the old, but always welcome, flirtation idea. The girl is a looker with an armful of S. A. [sex appeal] and the male is a competent wisecracking comic. They didn't miss a point and closed with a likeable bit, in which he turns in some very funny mugging when his lips work longingly as she coos a pop song right under his beezet. They could have stayed on all night. She made a change from fetching street attire to a French abbreviated dress which was used for more funny crossfire. Both are clever.

Fields and Fink moved in to a homer in the next to closing spot. Max Fields is a veteran Hebe comic and just right for vaudeville. The material, while familiar, is sold for 100%. They crossfired, sang and gagged to an impressive total.

Frequently, in a show, "part of it is Ar but the last half doesn't number [figure] at all." Instead of saying that an act played the Orpheum Circuit all Summer, the reporters of Variety say that it Orpheum-ed all Summer. When the Grove Street Theatre turns tickets over to the Leblang cut-rate agency, the headline is "Leblanging Grove Street." Here is one of Sime's own: "Miss Wallace lines up well alongside her partner and the combination is a pushover on Loew's or any other time." A final scene that goes back to the opening scene is a stet finale, a phrase evidently picked up from Variety's printers.

Nut comic is a common term for eccentric comedian, and when one of them, forgetting his lines, had to improvise, the paper reported him nutting along. Some girls were simulating hay fever in an act; throughout the story they were called hay feverettes. The leading man in the same skit was so successful that he sensationalized himself. Jazzist is the antonym of old schooley. A man is reported in trouble over misrepresenting facts to a girl whom he "hoaxed into a fake bathing beauts contest." Persons from Hollywood are referred to as coasters or coastlanders. When a new act was placed last on a programme, Variety put it: "Fred and Daisy Rial subbed in the walk-out assignment." The act ahead of it earned little applause, and therefore nosedived.

Gambling terms are picked up and used freely because they all belong to the fluid Broadway vocabulary. One thousand dollars is referred to as a grand and one hundred dollars is a century or a yard. But much of Variety's vocabulary is made up of ingenious variations on common Broadway expressions. It has developed, for example, the following new terms for a success: "zowied 'em," "copped everything," "bowled them," "wowed them," "walk-away hit" and "clicked heavy." It rarely reverts to the original "stopped the show" and "went over."

The mischievous son of a vaudeville agent annoyed a policeman so that he could watch his father fight and it was recounted that: "The kid steamed his pop into socking a cop in the Brooklyn baseball park, but the judge turned the old man out." It would never have happened if the policeman had not been in his unie.

Getting the laughter of an audience is pulling a bowl or a yell. A female impersonator, with spectacular gowns, is a "svelte performer, gasping the fems with his flash wardrobe." Variety makes deuce work for two, a pair, the second of a series, or a team of two. The word monicker is worked hard as a noun, and also put to use as a verb, as in the following: "A wrestler, monickered the Serbian Tiger, offered to throw anyone for 500 smacks and a couple of shills accepted his defy while the Tiger wiggled his breast muscles." Another stunt in the same circus performance turned out to be a breathtake, with the final ensemble a climaxer! The circus itself was so good that it was "an ultra organization."

The whole staff of Variety seems to be having a love affair with anent, and it is used in many curious ways, for example, "other comments anent the author," "anent radio's damage to pop songs." The word extant receives almost as much attention; it is employed in place of existing, current or in general use. Both are what Variety would call prop words. Sometimes the rhetoric of the paper reaches a point where it can't be understood without a key. Here is an example written by Sime himself:

After that, one who has not seen a German-made picture before for over seven years doesn't know where to start, this "Variety" film is such a paralyzer after that lapse and in comparison to seven years ago, in the progress by the Germans in picture making.

IV

At any hour of the day or night, passing on the north side of Forty-Sixth street, just east of Broadway, one may look across at the mongrel buildings which house make-up shops, theatrical agents, music publishers and film exchanges, and see at a second-story window of the narrowest of them, a man at his desk. If the weather is hot, he will be stripped to his undershirt. This is Sime on his throne, a dais at the front of the editorial department. He detests formal clothes and shakes them off like a quick-change artist, beginning when he leaves his Hispana-Suiza at the curb, continuing as he ascends the stairs, and concluding in a jumbled pile of hat, coat, tie, and collar, which he drops on his desk to grab papers with one hand and open his shirt with the other. Three steps below him lies the editorial room.

On the street floor below is the advertising department, and the floor above is devoted to the most complete theatrical morgue in the world. This collection of clippings takes up one-third of the paper's whole floor space. Sime maintains an elaborate establishment on Central Park West, but he has appropriated the top of his office building as his private apartment, and it is there that he entertains his cronies—many of them his own employés.

Variety's circulation is a mystery. Even members of the staff do not know it, although it is sold all over America and Europe. Sime probably is the only publisher ever heard of who refuses to make any statement to his advertisers. "All papers lie about their circulations," he says, "so claims aren't worth anything. I tell people to ask the corner news-stands. They know how many people plank down twenty cents for my sheet."

Sime has rejected every orthodox trade paper and class publication tradition and dogma, going ahead unsubsidized by financiers or advertisers, free, fearless, selling news, facts, rumors, whatever he believes his customers expect of him. He is no clean-up fanatic, no warring editor taking sides for the right. He waits to fight. The other side must make the first faces. But then he cuts loose. Every war which he has waged has been a war to preserve the independence of Variety. Although allied with the most corrupt business of the time, he has shot the works on decency and made it pay. A hard drinker, a keen gambler, a tough fighter, he is cut with sudden curious facets of tenderness. He is sentimental about his son, his friends and his paper. And he is the most respected man along Broadway.

MORALS AMONG THE UNMORAL

BY ELEANOR ROWLAND WEMBRIDGE

SOCIAL INHERITANCE is the passing on to the next generation of the accumulated inventions, customs, and modes of thought of the generation which precedes and produces it. That is one way of saying it. A more concrete statement of the same fact is that the Eskimo child responds enthusiastically to the custom of chewing walrus hide, whereas we, in youth, prefer all-day suckers. He considers that a raw fat fish is a holiday feast, whereas we flee shrieking from the cod-liver oil bottle. Is, or is not, whale blubber delicious? The only answer to the question is that blubber is what you like, if you like that sort of thing. And how young must we begin, if we are to thoroughly enjoy fish-oil as a diet? The physical and mental age has not been determined by scientists, but we are safe in saying—pretty young. The most casual observation tells us that we tend to remain cold to the customs that did not warm us in our infancy, and warm to those that did, whether they happen to be concerned with diet, politics or table manners. Only by a very considerable jolt in later life can our values be reversed, and even then our nervous system is never wholly convinced.

But if this is true of codes and manners, can it also be true of right and wrong? Here many practical moralists will not agree. "Sin is sin," they protest. "The moral law must be the same for all, for conscience is a universal and infallible guide." Nevertheless, an observer of many undeniable sinners, offenders not only against legal codes but also against supposedly natural law, is obliged to differ. If one attempts to understand the psychology of habitual offenders, and to study it as one would study the strange folkways of the Bushman, or the African pigmy, one finds no lack of codes to be sure, but a set of them as completely different from our own as if their votaries too had inherited an alien culture, which, in point of fact, they have.

Perhaps no delinquent exhibits more striking variation from accepted standards than the girl of persistently loose morals. She belongs to a sisterhood which has held throughout history a position of some prominence. She has been laughed at, and thundered against, sought in secret, but shunned in the open, exploited, sentimentalized over, and reformed with such difficulty that she remains the despair of the reformer. In fact, almost every approach has been made to her but the simple one of trying to understand her. And understanding her can only be accomplished by the same means that one attempts to understand, say—the boll weevil or the gasoline engine. Nothing is gained by exhorting the weevil, the engine, or the girl, if they go wrong. To mend their ways they must be understood.

What is she then, calmly considered as a social fact? The first discovery which one makes is to be expected, namely, that not all of the species are alike. All immoral girls do not have the same code any more than all moral ones. Their one habit of sex irregularity is no more of a bond between them than the bond of respect for morals makes the tastes of a nun identical with those of a pioneer wife who has raised ten children, handled fifty farm hands, and organized the Grange. Both of the latter fulfil their functions within the law, but aside from their possible common ability to feed a crowd, they have probably hardly one habit in common. So with the sex delinquents. Granted their one tendency to a sex life out of wedlock, they not only may have nothing else in common, but, like the rest of us, they are usually violently unsympathetic with any irregularity which varies from their own. They share our human talent of sliding gracefully out from under a law which they ruthlessly apply to others, but again like us, they do it without conscious hypocrisy. They have absorbed uncritically the tradition as it was passed on to them, and they feel among their groups the fine distinctions which an outsider can no more grasp than the non-academic mind can detect a difference between an LL.D. and an LL.B., or the non-musical appreciate the horrors of singing flat.

II

So it was with Millie, who at fourteen married a miner of forty-two. The marriage failing to be a success, she eloped to the city with a taxi-driver, with whom she now lives. She has a factory job and supports Joe when he has gambled away his wages. She cannot afford a divorce ($60) nor does she particularly wish to marry Joe. "Once is enough," says Millie, and she is very scornful of Ella, who is also eighteen. Ella was also reared in a mining town, but ran away, not from her husband, but with him. She supports him by prostitution with men whom he provides. "Dirty Dagoes" is Millie's comment on Ella, and she turns a cold shoulder. "I am living with my own husband, which is more than you can say," retorts Ella, "and I make a better living, at that."

Yet with all their intolerance for each other's standards they have a certain bond, for both girls are fond of their ill-chosen mates. They have nursed them through many a drunk, or welcomed them back after a period at the workhouse. In short, they show the same consideration for their consorts' peculiarities that many a good wife exhibits toward those of an eccentric but well-loved husband. "The poor fella, he's out of work," explains Ella. Emotionally at least, each girl is, for the present, true to the man of her choice and tries to please him. Each succeeds in holding him as well as any other woman is likely to, and is pleased with herself and with him. Both are subject to arrest under our laws—and get arrested with about the same frequency and inconvenience as they catch a cold and with as little damage to their self-respect.

By an accident Corinne also got arrested one day, and sat on the same bench with them. A greater contrast could hardly be imagined. Corinne sells goods in an exclusive shop all day, and knows the difference between a local hat and a French model for $50 as well as her customers. She has the same standards of dress that they have, looks as well in high-priced clothes, and suffers as much as they from clothes of inferior make. Her wages, however, do not cover the expense of such a wardrobe, so she consorts with men who can and will help her pay for it. Millie and Ella loudly protest their affection for their men, but Corinne, when asked if her feelings are engaged with any of hers, gives a shrug which says as plainly as words, "Don't be silly!" Other women marry for a living; eventually she intends to do so herself, and she undoubtedly will. In the meantime she intends to dress well by the only means she can—for if she does not dress well, she will never induce the type of man she wants to marry her. It is a vicious circle, but as simple as arithmetic. In fact, her behavior is based entirely upon bookkeeping. Finance, and not emotion, has been her downfall. The two unpardonable sins, to her, are to be unwashed and to be a fool, and Millie and Ella are obviously both. They glare at her and call her a brass chicken. She glances at them and their grimy consorts and murmurs, "Page the Board of Health." Each girl is as sure of her own code and as disgusted with those of the others as the most righteous of vestals. Even Ella has her boast: she is the only woman of the three who shares her residence with her own husband.

Still another type is Pauline. Pauline could not get on at home. Her father demanded her pay envelope and her mother would not let her go to dances. So she ran away, got herself a job, and now lives in a rooming-house. Occasionally she goes broke, and then and then only, she picks up a few dollars on the street to pay her rent and get some clothes. "When I had my teeth out it cost an awful lot, and once I wanted Susie to visit me, and her ticket was $40. But I don't hustle much. Honest I don't. I haven't hustled since last November, when I got my fur coat." It is Pauline's boast that she "hustles" only to pay her honest debts.

Nina's boast is just the reverse. I recall meeting her just after an interview with Pauline, when I still rashly assumed that because both were young, immoral, and poor, their folkways were the same. Nothing could be further from the case. Nina admitted her irregular habits with the utter lack of embarrassment of a clear conscience, but at some remark of mine based upon Pauline's behavior she flared up.

"You don't think I am low, do you?" she asked, with her first blush rising to her eyebrows.

"I thought you just told me yourself what you had done," I answered, astonished at this anger.

"But do you think I take money for it?" she blazed back. "When I go wild, I go for fun, and because I want to. I would never be so low as to take a cent if I starved for it. That's me all over, Missis. What jazzing round I do, I do for nothing."

Nina is therefore known among the sisterhood as a Charity, and viewed with admiration or contempt, according to their codes. In some standard vocabularies used in mental examinations the word Charity occurs to test the observer's ability to understand abstract terms. Not for some time did I discover why mention of this virtue caused such embarrassment, and why there was often such a hasty denial of any idea as to its meaning. To be a Charity is to be amiable without payment. It is a badge of distinction to the Ninas who glory in their love of gaiety and their indifference to reward—but "poor boobs" sneer Pauline and Corinne at the scabs of their trade. "Regular guys we are," boast the Charitys. It is as sobering to reflect upon the debasement of this fine old word and the probable connotation of charity hospitals and Sisters of Charity to the Ninas of society, as it is from time to time to note the mismanagement of some banking house operating under the title of Equity, Fidelity, or Trust. If words were conscious, they would shudder at their own misuse.

III

But whatever the lines which mark their social levels, and whatever their arguments as to what is high and what is low, there is usually an agreement among sex delinquents that racial lines must be recognized in their profession. The white girl who so far forgets herself as to consort voluntarily with men of the black or yellow races must be low indeed. "A coon or a chink, I should say not! I wouldn't lower myself," says Leona with her pert little cackle. It is the only standard that she knows, but she draws her color line with firmness and with pride.

However, all girls do not share Leona's scruples. Not only that, but some of them have developed a code by which they convince themselves that other races show them a kindness and deference which they cannot expect from their own. They can even demand polite formalities from their social inferiors which would be absurd if they were not so tragic. Girls of this type usually admit their own degradation with complete candor. "Of course I'm low or I wouldn't stand for it," they say with disarming earnestness. And the exhibition of an emotional life so young, yet so petrified, affects at least one observer like the face of a child with sightless eyes. There is profound pathos in finding ashes where the fires of youth should be, and to watch such a girl linger in the doorway, as she turns inevitably to reënter a life from which it is too late to wean her, is like watching a frail ghost reënter her own grave. After such encounters one understands why Dante incased his lowest Hell in ice, below even the reach of fire. Yet there are still lower depths and more grotesque and distorted folkways—but is it profitable to multiply examples?

If so, what other codes shall we include? I say nothing of the wayward rich because there are not so many of them, and whatever their habits, the burden of folly falls not on them, but on the poor. I have ignored the girls of high standards led astray—the Marguerites and Effie Deans of romance, for they present no psychological riddle. Their codes are usual. They have merely been lured from them by emotion. And to introduce a pleasant note let it be said that although they suffer acutely for a time, their story (the novelists notwithstanding) is likely to end happily. Mr. Woolworth fortunately provides wedding rings within the compass of the most modest purse, and some appropriate man is usually glad to marry the pleasant young “widow” and adopt her child.

I have not included a study of neurotic sex deviations from the normal, for that is a chapter in itself. I have not even talked about the feeble-minded, for though many prostitutes are undoubtedly feeble-minded or near it, there are also many feeble-minded girls who are not prostitutes. Just as the dullest matron may be armor-plated against infidelity, so her equally dull daughter may be genuinely horrified at anything not “nice,” if she has been brought up that way. If sufficiently tempted, she may violate her conscience, to be sure, but so may her more gifted sister. The psychological fact remains that she has one, and that it conforms to a socially acceptable standard.

I am far from hazarding an opinion as to what is the proper sex code for anyone, man or woman. But experience shows this: that unless a girl without means can cultivate the habit, when still young, of living on what she earns, or on what is provided by someone legitimately responsible for her, she is certain to become an economic parasite, to pass on her practices to her younger mates, as children bequeath their hopscotch and their marbles, and eventually, like an unwholesome bird that befouls the nest, to defile her own young. Even the Charitys are not so independent as they boast. Their joy-rides, their shows, and their suppers are payment of a substantial sort. There is nothing to hold any of them from the pursuit of luxuries beyond their purses, save only a certain prejudice in favor of chastity. If this prejudice is absent from their culture, can it be hung like an artificial arm where there is not even a joint to strap it to? Can such girls, and their brothers, ever be made to feel our folkways? If so, how shall we begin? To what emotions shall we appeal?

Do not tell the girls that if they are vicious they will never marry, for they all do. Do not tell them that they will not marry as good a type of man as they would have married anyway, for they will. Do not tell them that other people do not regard what they do as lightly as they do themselves, for their code is but the reflection of their group, and their own group is their world. Do not try to shame them by saying that promiscuity is a trait of dull women, for they will readily agree. They will insist further that only the rich girl can afford to be dull, untrained, and yet fastidious. Do not try to scare them with the probable consequences to their health, for hygiene as well as chastity is absent from their tradition: a short life and a merry one will be their answer. Do not say that it is illegal, but contemplate the force in that argument the next time you are served with a cocktail.

Curiously enough, the ethical doctrine of the Earl of Shaftesbury, that bad morals are bad taste, comes the nearest to their understanding. Most of them agree that noisy gobbling of soup is not nice. And sometimes we look out of the window at an alley cat of loose morals, and they laugh ruefully at the resemblance. They hate to think that they look just like that to anybody. And if a reduction of the moral law to that of prowling cats and noisy soup is a decking out of that stern goddess in rather scanty drapery, we must cut our garments from what material we have, on the principle that any drapery is better than none at all.

Thus far, experience points to the fact that the acquiring of a sex code takes place along about the time that the individual acquires language. Unless the language is learned before, say, the age of ten, it is never the mother tongue. It may be learned with an effort, and lived by if necessary, but it will not be felt. It will show an accent, and in moments of stress, the language of infancy will take its place. I have been told of an English lady who, upon meeting a reformed cannibal, congratulated him upon his change of diet.

"You no longer believe in cannibalism?" she asked.

"I do not," he replied with a dignified but appraising glance. "Nevertheless," he added, "nothing will ever taste so good as a plump little English woman's thumb!"

I am told that the lady moved on rather hastily; and if so, her instincts were entirely sound. No technic can be considered learned unless the knowledge has got past the cerebrum, and is accepted by the spinal cord, the muscles, and the solar plexus. Only then will it operate quickly enough to be of value. If the cannibal's brain had accepted the new code, but the nerves of his stomach had not, he was like our young wantons, whose experience may tell them that their habits needed mending, but whose nervous systems do not yet rise in protest against so simple a method of getting a fur coat as prostituting for it.

I was once one of a group of guests at a church service in a reformatory for young girl offenders. The psalms of David had been chosen for the reading, apparently as least likely to offend the religious sensibilities of Catholic, Protestant or Jew, and the psalm which became branded on my memory was the fifty-fifth. As I listened to the girls' glib responses, the sentimental tears came into my eyes. Was it possible that these little castaways from a great city did not see that David had written the psalm about them? "I have seen violence and strife in the city," they chanted. "Deceit and guile depart not from her streets. For it was not an enemy that reproached me; then I could have borne it. Neither was it he that hated me that did magnify himself against me; then I would have hid myself from him. But it was thou, a man, mine equal, my guide and my acquaintance". . . .

The words were too appropriate. I hesitated to look up to see the tragic response which I expected. But did I observe any? Not in the least. The unconscious victims snapped off the final curse, "But Thou, O Lord, shalt bring them down into destruction. Bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days," and slammed their Bibles into the racks with the dispatch of those who long for dinner. How strange, I reflected, that they do not realize their own tragedy. And then, glancing at the row of well-bred, well-fed friends beside me, I wondered whether we should have noticed any great relevancy if, instead of the fifty-fifth, the psalm had happened to be the second, with its wild verse, "He that sitteth in the Heavens shall laugh. The Lord shall have them in derision." Should we have felt at all uncomfortable, or lost our appetites? Not we. We, as well as they, were too well-trained in our code to take the words of an over-excited poet seriously. We, too, would have cast covert glances at the clock, smoothed out our ruffles, and closed our Bibles with a yawn. Why assume that any social tragedy includes us among its chorus? Why get upset? How do we know which of His creatures are so sublimely ludicrous that they make even the Lord laugh?

THE MOUNTAIN MEN

BY BERNARD DE VOTO

FOR over two centuries after the establishment of the British and French colonies in America, the frontier of exploration was pushed westward by fur-traders far in advance of the frontier of settlement. The fur-trader was the actual pioneer, the trail-breaker and the map-maker of a continent. He prepared the way that emigration was to follow—charted the rivers, discovered the passes, and marked the trails by which seekers of free lands or of gold and silver were to penetrate the wilderness. Of necessity, he was a riverman. Once across the Alleghanies, rivers and the Great Lakes were the means of access to the Mississippi valley, and west of the Mississippi the key to the high plains and the mountains was the Missouri with its scores of tributaries.

No better rivermen than the Canadian voyageurs, French and French half-breeds, ever lived. In canoe, bull-boat, or keel-boat, by pole, paddle, or cordelle, they went wherever water would float them; and, under the direction of adventurous Scotchmen who had the faculties of leadership and organization which they lacked, they made fortunes for such employers as the Hudson's Bay Company, the North West Company, and John Jacob Astor. Toward the end of the first quarter of the Nineteenth Century, however, the scene and methods of the fur-trade changed radically. The British, finally ousted from American territory, moved to Oregon, and the exhaustion of the lower Missouri and Great Lakes fields forced their American competitors westward toward the Rocky mountains, the Columbia river, and the drainage-basin of the Great Salt Lake. But the new fields, though rich, were difficult of access. The line of communication up the Missouri was long and the passes were difficult—and the country of the Blackfoot Indians was squarely in the way.

The Blackfeet were implacable enemies of the whites, and they were the best fighters in the West. The Assiniboinés, the Utes, the Shoshones, the Snakes, and even the Crows and the Arikaras could sometimes be counted on for friendship, but the Blackfeet were always hostile. Even the Crows, who were the greatest thieves, and the Utes, who were the best riders, had been known to pass up a white man's horse or to return it after using it a while, but when a Blackfoot saw a horse he stole it without further ado and you had to scalp him to get it back. The rest would sometimes leave a caravan alone and could be easily intimidated, but whenever a white party came within sight of the Blackfeet they at once swept down on it with horrid caterwauling and violent intent. They would not trade their furs nor allow the whites to trap in their country. As the trade moved in their direction, they nearly wrecked it.

Then one William Henry Ashley formed a partnership with Andrew Henry, who, as a member of the Missouri Fur Company, had already suffered disasters at the hands of the Blackfeet. Henry waited to suffer one more and to see Ashley routed by the Arikaras, and then abandoned the trade altogether. Ashley was a Virginian who had emigrated to St. Louis, in the days of its glamor, and when he entered the fur trade in 1822 he was Lieutenant-Governor of the new State of Missouri and a general of its militia. After he had made a fortune in the trade, he served three terms in the National House of Representatives, where he was a supporter of Benton and an authority on the West. He once entertained Daniel Webster so successfully that the orator ever after remembered St. Louis as a city of miraculous beverages.

This Ashley, by a process of trial and error, devised the new methods the fur-trade required. In 1822, with Henry, he ascended the Missouri in the orthodox way. Leaving Henry to go on, he went back to St. Louis and led a second party up the river in 1824. At the Arikara villages, he was attacked, routed, and demoralized. Meanwhile Henry had also been harassed by the Arikaras and had lost most of his horses to the Blackfeet. The two expeditions were so costly a failure that Henry withdrew from the trade, but they furnished Ashley the clue to ultimate success. For several of Henry's detachments had gone on to the Green, the Bear, and the Snake rivers and on their way had re-discovered South Pass, and when, in 1825, Ashley led another expedition to meet them, he marched directly up the Platte river, breaking a great part of what was to be the most important trail in the exploration and settlement of the West.

This route along the Platte and through South Pass shortened the line of communication many hundred miles. It also lay in lower latitudes, led by easy gradients through passes which were open most of the Winter, and permitted the use of wheeled vehicles to the very crest of the Continental Divide. Furthermore, it was far south of the Blackfoot country. It therefore permitted the fur-trade to reach its most promising fields with something like ease and security. But the Platte was not navigable and much of the route was altogether separated from water. The country, most of it mountains or desert, required the trader to possess qualities the riverman had never needed. Thus Ashley's new system tended to substitute for the trader, who got his furs by barter with the Indians, the trapper who hunted them himself, and tended also to require him to stay permanently in the mountains, meeting his employers at an annual rendezvous, where he turned in his peltries and received enough supplies to last him for another year.

All these requirements drove the voyageurs out of the trade. A new figure took the place of the riverman: the mountain man. He was, in the overwhelming majority, a Virginian or a Kentuckian, though Jedediah Smith, perhaps the best of them all, was a Yankee. Many of the most eminent accompanied Ashley in 1822 and 1823, among them Smith, Etienne Provot, Jim Bridger, Thomas Fitzpatrick, William and Milton Sublette, David Jackson, Hugh Glass, and Louis Vasquez.

These mountain men were the true wilderness-beaters of the last American frontier. For fifteen or twenty years they pushed into all the fastnesses of our most difficult ranges. They created several fortunes, in which they never participated, and they did so at the cost of hazardous lives, obscure and violent deaths, energy and privation and daring almost inconceivable, and a skill which has never had a superior on American soil. Romance and the movie have gilded the cowboy, the gold-seeker, and the homesteader as the true frontiersmen, and ignored the trapper beside whom the cowboy had an unskilled occupation, the Forty-niner traveled in comfort along pleasant boulevards, and the homesteader made a living with comparative ease. For the mountain man had to be skilled at a dozen trades that none of the others ever needed. Separated by a thousand miles from the outposts of civilization, he had to be self-sufficient in a world he had himself created and had to accommodate his world to a thousand daily emergencies. He not only had to live off the country, sometimes for years on end, but he had to defend himself against the country and its aboriginal inhabitants. He had to master a complex and extremely difficult craft—or die.

II

The elements of prairie-craft and woods-craft were, of course, part of the American tradition everywhere outside the towns, part of the elementary education every boy was subjected to, but the mountain men had to adapt them to a far greater variety of circumstances than anyone else ever encountered. Basically, the craft was Indian. The virtues which the Indians admired were those which the trapper emulated. He dressed like an Indian and was most easily flattered by being told that he resembled one. Along the seams of his buckskin breeches and shirt ran a fringe, sometimes worked with dyed quills like his moccasins and leggings. Quills or beads ornamented the pouches that held his powder and shot and the fur cap he wore in Winter. A sash of crimson or yellow completed the costume—or in Winter a fur coat, or the scarlet blanket that symbolized grandeur to the Indian. He wore his hair long, leaving it free or braiding it with shells, ribbons or bright feathers.

The trapper could buy buckskin from the Indians, but he frequently tanned his own. The fresh skin was scraped free of hair on one side and of tissue and ligaments on the other, by the aid of water and ashes and much labor, and was then twisted and worked in every direction till it became flexible. A prolonged dubbing with a mixture of brains and water followed, after which it was again stretched, kneaded, and twisted to the pliability of silk. The only remaining operation was smoking, which was carried out over a greenwood smudge till the skin acquired an orange-brown color. No other material has ever equalled buckskin for moccasins, leggings, and outdoor clothes of every kind. It was warmer than wool, it made no noise against the underbrush, it had a neutral protective color, it was proof against cactus and the minor assaults of stones and sticks, it did not rot, and it wore indefinitely.

Besides buckskin, the mountain men made other kinds of leather as the occasion demanded. Rawhide, stiffly flexible and as hard as oak, was prepared in skin-sizes and cut up to serve as ropes and thongs of all sorts; twisted or braided, it did for harness or riatas; or properly molded, it served better than iron to shoe horses for the flinty uplands. It could be dried on forms in the shape of buckets, boxes, and shields, and was practically everlasting. The sinews of slaughtered animals, whole or divided or braided together, served as thread and light cord. Their bladders and paunches were carefully preserved for watertight containers of everything from powder to goose-grease.

The customary outfit included a skinning knife which was a common butcher knife till Colonel Bowie invented a better one, a tomahawk (shingler's hatchet), a rifle and perhaps a pistol or a bow, powder and lead in pouches, buffalo robes for shelter and bedding, a packet of awls and needles, from three to six beaver traps, flint and steel, and a minimum of extras. Each man had two horses for himself and from one to three for his outfit and furs, and to these he must be both hostler and veterinary. The horses put a definite check on the movements of the party, for where there was no fodder there could be no trapping. Some hardy upland grasses were available all year long, being edible even when buried under snow, but in regions of alkali or lava and in those which had been "et over," there was only one recourse, the cottonwood tree. The inner bark of one species, Populus occidentalis (angulata), when shredded and chopped up, provided a fodder as nutritious as hay. It had to be kept warm in Winter, for when frozen its jagged sides would pierce the intestines.

The mountain men lived almost exclusively on meat, and though the modern faddist would condemn them to every ill from Bright's disease to pyorrhea, managed to lead active and hilarious lives for as long as they escaped scalping. Throughout all the fur-country, the buffalo roamed in great herds and might be killed with little exertion. The Indians thriftily ran them over cliffs, when that was possible, to avoid labor and the loss of weapons. The trappers rode them down and shot them with rifles or, perhaps even more efficiently at short range, with arrows. The hump and the tongue were the most succulent portions, and young cows were far more desirable than bulls. The frontier staple, pemmican, was made from buffalo-meat. Into "officers' pemmican" went only the humps and the marrow, but the ordinary article was made up indiscriminately of all cuts. Strips of meat were dried in the sun or smoked over a fire till crisp and were then pulverized between stones and mixed with equal parts of melted fat. The mixture when pounded down in skin bags and sealed with fat would keep sweet for years. It was probably the best concentrated food ever devised. Two tablespoonfuls would make an excellent meal for one man, and he might eat it raw or warm it over a fire and flavor it with service berries, choke cherries, wild currants or any other fruit that was at hand.

The buffalo were wanderers; no one knew in advance where they might be found. If no herd was in sight, the trapper took what he could get—deer, antelope, elk, bear, geese, ducks, prairie chicken, or sage hens. Mountain lion, or "painter," was a delicacy, and porcupine a treat, but such vermin as wolves and coyotes were to be eaten only in extremity—which would sometimes force a man as low as prairie dog or even muskrat. The beavers which supplied the trapper's livelihood were contemptible as food. All these supplies were likely to fail, especially at the highest altitudes or toward the end of Winter. Then Indian lore was called upon to distinguish edible from bitter or poisonous roots and to provide other substitutes. Dozens of mountain plants could be safely eaten, but most of these grew on the lower levels or were unavailable under the snow. A slender meal could sometimes be made from wild rosebuds, or the Digger Indians—the shy, ubiquitous pariahs of the frontier—might be prevailed upon to give up their stores of sunflower seeds, and along the Columbia there was the chance of meeting a tribe that had smoked salmon.

Coffee and tobacco were the principal stores carried from the East, and their loss by plunder or accident was a catastrophe. They, more than anything else, made life in the wilderness comfortable, and the trapper would boil the empty sack that had held coffee or smoke the papers that had wrapped his tobacco. No adequate substitute for them existed, though a hot drink could be made from wheat, and dried cedar-bark and the bark and berries of kin-nikinnick could be smoked with some satisfaction.

III

Nearly every kind of pelt the trapper could take was worth something. He traded in otter, marten, mink, bear, buffalo, deer, and elk hides, but all these were incidental to his principal business, beaver. The fur trade was the beaver trade and, in America, its dépôt was St. Louis, where an average fur was worth from four to eight dollars, exactly twice what it had brought to the trapper, who, after that discount, bought his outfit and supplies from the purchaser at an advance on St. Louis prices of never less than 100%. The beaver's value to the trapper, then, never exceeded one-fourth of what it brought in the States and was liable to decline to an eighth.

The beavers were to be found on the tributaries of the larger streams. Such rivers as the Green, the Bear, the Snake, the Fraser, the Yellowstone, and the three forks of the Missouri were fed by a multitude of creeks along which the trapper found his richest harvest. Trapping required a complex knowledge of stream-craft, topography, climatology, and animal psychology. As the beavers retired to their lodges during cold weather and as the fur was worthless during the Summer, the hunting seasons were the Fall and Spring. Each man set his traps as his fur-sense dictated. The beaver-dam was the starting-place; and near it, in natural approaches, the trap would be set so as to stay only a few inches below the surface of the stream. It was pegged down to a stake, fastened to a chain round a boulder or otherwise secured. No bait was used beyond "castoreum," or castor, a rank internal secretion of the beaver itself which served at once to attract the animal and to cover the scent of the trapper's hands. Trap, chain, and anchor were also well rubbed with green deer-hide to eradicate the smell of man.

In this operation, the craft lay in finding the right place for the trap. Obviously, a trap set at random would catch its prey only by accident, one set in too deep water would be ignored, and one in too shallow or too exposed a place would betray itself. The trap, too, must be so arranged that it would drag the captive's head under water and drown him. The trapper generally worked upstream from the mouth, staying as long as necessary on any given creek. Usually he worked in the water, wading most of the way to keep his scent from grass and brush. A position in midstream had the further advantage of making surprise by Indians less likely.

His constant following of streams was the basis of his most impressive skill: his ability to find his way in the wilderness. The country in which he lived was a chaos of peaks, canyons, alkali flats, valleys, lava plains, sand and salt deserts, timberland prolonged on a scale hardly to be realized, crisscrossed by rivers and ranges, infinitely deceptive and infinitely hazardous. Trails marked the major sequences, raying out from the most important passes, but every trail not originally marked by Indians was the trappers' work and their daily labor took them into unblazed country. To carry out a campaign of several months' duration which would take a party through a given district, visiting specified streams, picking up other parties at places and dates arranged months before, and finally arrive on time at a rendezvous separated by hundreds of miles from both starting-place and trapping grounds, required the best military leadership and individual skill. The trapper read the country he passed over with practised eyes, picked out its gradients, monuments, and exits, stored away a photographic impression of it, and made it a part of his learning to be contributed to the common stock. By 1827, it was practically impossible for a mountain man to be lost in the vast country he worked through—a fact to be compared with the disaster that overtook the gold-seeker or the emigrant whenever they forsook the main-traveled road.

The keys to this formidable lore were the peaks and the drainage system. The trapper's first act on reaching a new stream or valley was to climb the peak that commanded the vicinity. From its summit he could make out the direction the streams took and the flow of the master-creek. He could also follow the mass of ridges, peaks, parks and valleys. He needed little more. For years he had exchanged information with every newcomer and so knew by heart all the principal streams, passes and other landmarks. He checked his decision by many other signs: height, size, kind and abundance of timber; number and drift of buffalo; vegetation, coloring of rocks, fauna; prevalence of winds, snow, alkali, or sand; hot springs, waterfalls, Indian tribes.

The tactics developed by defense against the Indians in such country were passed on to the emigrant trains, and, in technical adaptations, still play a part in the Infantry and Cavalry Drill Regulations and the Field Service Regulations of the United States Army. A large brigade was safe from direct attack by any tribe except the Blackfeet and so was chiefly concerned with guarding its horses. Advance, rear and flank guards were sent out on the march. At the bivouac the wagons were chained together in a circle which formed a corral. If all the horses could not be got inside, they were picketed by night, being allowed to graze only before sunset and after dawn. If there were no wagons the corral consisted of the fur-packs, from three to nine to a man, and other impedimenta. When the horses were stampeded in spite of all precautions, the brigade must go after their captors and stampede them in return.

Smaller parties were in greater danger. Guerrilla warfare with its intrenchments and open-order skirmishing was the daily routine of the trade. One vital element of such warfare was trailing—the art of telling by ground-sign who had passed that way, in what numbers, how recently, and in what state of mind. The marks of lodge-poles indicated a peace party, since tepees and hence squaws were part of the expedition. The number and dispersion of the horses revealed the purpose of the party, the freshness or exhaustion of the stock, and the distance from its objective or its home. The identity of the tribe might be disclosed by the hoof-prints, by the shape of a deserted bivouac, by fragments of food, lost head-dresses, pieces of fur or skin, decorations, or weapons. Single trails might be as revealing. An expert trailer could tell at what gait a horse had passed, how many hours or days had since elapsed, and what the probable destination was. He could make a shrewd guess as to the rider's state of mind.

Wounds sustained in warfare or accidents must be treated by the most primitive surgery. Broken bones could be set, arrows could be pulled out, and lacerations from a bear's or a panther's claws could be treated with pitch, goose-grease, bear-grease or poultices made of corn-meal, soft-soap, or anything else that folk-lore might prescribe. A few drastic amputations are recorded—arms and legs cut off with hand-made saws, the arteries closed with cauteries extemporized from red-hot ram-rods. In those dry and dustless altitudes infected wounds were very rare. The brigade's dispensary contained only the simple, heroic remedies of frontier therapy—eye-lotions, great masses of calomel, a variety of physics, rubifacients and expectorants and febrifuges from the traditional pharmacopœia, bismuth and opium for mountain dysentery, and perhaps copaiba and cinchona.

The medicines were but little called upon, for few distempers harassed the mountain men. They suffered far less from disease than from black-flies and mosquitoes. Rattlesnakes, too, were a great terror—more dreaded than Indians, more lied about than the Yellowstone country. The approved treatment was to cicatrize the bite and apply a tourniquet above it. The frontiersman recognized the desirability of a stimulant and preferred the traditional snakebite whiskey to the contemporary strychnine. Vaguely understanding that some antidote was desirable, he bound a quid of tobacco over the cicatrice or, when possible, a slice cut from the snake that had bitten him.

IV

When the beavers went into hiding and the canyons were choked with snow, scattered bands of trappers met at designated places for the Winter encampment. Open valleys to the south or the west of tall ranges made desirable camp-grounds, but the best ones were those circular recesses known as holes, deep, wide, and sheltered from wind and snow. Two or three hundred whites commonly gathered together and not infrequently they were joined by many lodges of Indians, for war was a purely warm weather diversion. The two camps would be separated by a quarter of a mile, but intercourse between them was continuous.

A pastoral contentment characterized these Winter doldrums. The horses moved slowly along the southern slopes. Along the half-frozen creek, in huts of brush or skin, Indians and trappers alike carried on their Winter tanning and dressing. The stock of firewater, if any had survived the last rendezvous, had long since been exhausted, so that there was no carousing. By night the huts filled with adventurous men whose authentic adventures surpassed those of all wanderers from Ulysses to Marco Polo. The true story of Hugh Glass has had to wait till recently for its epic, and the wanderings of the lost trappers then believed in have been proved fictitious, but they made great tales around the fire, and every listener could contribute episodes from his own past no less heroic. And when the true Romance sang, the bounds of heaven and earth were removed away, and in a new universe super-trappers went forth to their titanic destinies, gathering packs of beaver Paul Bunyan himself could not have moved, slaying whole nations of Indians, driving over the edge of the world more buffalo than could have grazed along the Milky Way, and entering at last those Islands of the Blest Trappers where life was an eternal rendezvous—overflowing with Virginia tobacco and Kentucky liquors and made beautiful by lodges of Indian squaws, slender and beaded and forever young.

More than one man has paid his respects to the talk in these snow-bound huts. And no wonder, for though the average trapper was illiterate, there were among the mountain men some of ambiguous past and mysterious present. Life on the far frontier had its attractions for some who had had and lost great names in the East. The excitement of the trails, too, called out more than one gentleman amateur, even a few with hereditary titles. Every year scientists and globe-trotters came out to study the rocks, the birds or the flowers, and these were elegant gentlemen. There were too the secret agents of Great Britain, the United States, and even Spain and Russia, unobtrusively doing the will of their Foreign Offices. So that the University of the Rocky Mountains, as one trapper called Winter quarters, did not lack learned professors. But the university was no Thelema and the arts and the sciences were supplemented by such games as Old Sledge and Spoil-Five. And of course, as single men in deerskin huts, they found the daughters of the Indians fair.

For splendor the Winter camp yielded to the rendezvous. Toward the end of June a general movement would begin toward one or another of the places designated by Eastern employers the year before. Such places were pleasant valleys along the upper Green, the Portneuf, Henry's Fork, the labyrinths of Jackson's or Pierre's Holes, and the vicinity of Bear Lake, Bear River, Cache Valley and the Ogden or the Weber in the valley of Great Salt Lake.

From all around came the Indians, to trade their furs if they had any, to barter for firewater, and to steal whatever was unguarded. If it were purely a company rendezvous, besides the Indians only the company's employés and the nearby bands of free trappers met the caravans from the East. But as competition stiffened, the rival companies began to rendezvous within a mile or so of each other, in an effort to debauch as many Indians and free trappers as possible and, by higher prices and more generous portions of alcohol, to attract deserters from their competitors. Such a festival might bring together a thousand resident white trappers, half as many more in the caravans from the States, and from three to five thousand Indians. One clump of timber and its adjacent meadows would form the park of the company founded by Ashley and taken over by successive partnerships. A mile away were the tents of the American Fur Company, Astor's successor and the eventual victor in the trade. Austerely remote, restrained by British regulations from the cruder debaucheries, Ross or McKay or Ogden represented the stockholders of the Hudson's Bay Company. Such an amateur as Wyeth or Bonneville might also make a pretentious camp nearby, and there might be the humbler stations of smaller St. Louis firms, with bands of free trappers roving clamorously among them all.

A radius of eight hundred miles would not cover all the country ransacked within the year by those who gathered at such a rendezvous. Personages from the East, with sometimes a petty German prince or an ambassador in their keeping, came to watch their employés and their profits. From the South came Dick Wootton, Kit Carson, and their half-Spanish retainers—dignified, expansive, ceremonious. From the North, the Scotch factors of the Hudson's Bay Company, chaperoning a younger son or two, with rituals of rank, precedence, and table etiquette. Such purely American giants as Fitzpatrick, Bridger, and many others of their kind—the mountain men in quintessence, violent, hardy, wise beyond expression, and, till the mysteries began, taciturn. A rabble of camp-followers of all kinds. And everywhere Indians.

The substratum was a bitter commercial rivalry that used every device of bribery, theft, and debauchery to win an advantage. But the mountain men left such civilized concerns to their employers. They were not interested in profits—cared little, when the rendezvous was over, whether they had fully discharged their debts to the company or had tripled them for the next year. For them the rendezvous was a fair, a market-day, a town-meeting, with overtones of the pagan mysteries, the sessions court and the Olympic games. The kegs of raw alcohol were brought out. Whites, half-breeds and Indians gathered round them. And presently the peaks were giving back the echoes of the clamor of strong men at their ease. Four hundred thousand square miles of mountain and desert had to be accounted for in news, gossip, oratory and debate. Here and there bands of roaring men held saddle-races, foot-races, and target practice; elsewhere knives, hatchets and javelins were thrown in competition; here a strong man raised four times as many beaver-skins with one hand as his opponent could with two;

there a grudge fight was put through to a finish, or the guesses of a hundred Winter campfires were settled when a Chouteau man pinned the shoulders of a Hudson's Bay champion to the ground. The alcohol flowed on by night and songs were sung by choruses of a hundred bull-throated wassailers—songs that not all the tears of connoisseurs or collectors can ever recover. By dawn, perhaps, with the same ecstatic joy, extemporized armies were assaulting each other with clubs, stones and fists, all for fellowship and the hope of a good yarn for next Winter's fires.

In and out among all the groups weaved the Indians, frantic for alcohol. They had already learned the art they have since practiced so profitably, of displaying their religious ceremonies for pay. Over the hill roared their mock battles, pursuits, captures and scalp-dances. Chiefs bartered their wives and daughters for a cup of watered alcohol. Wives and daughters without a chief's protection did a good business for themselves in beads, mirrors, blankets, and other gewgaws. All innocently, too, they roused jealousies that could be settled only with the skinning-knife. The clamor rose in pitch and volume. All about the pleasant groves were groups of dancing, shouting, guzzling heroes. White or red, the alcohol had its way with them, and their survivors laid them out in impersonal rows to await the waking. And in a week the caravans had gone, only a grave or two and much refuse marked the rendezvous, and life was dull again till next Summer.

Such were the mountain men in the day of their grandeur. Few of them would serve for heroes of romantic novels. All of them sinned against most of the taboos of their age. All told, there were not many of them, and their heyday was short. But American life lost much of its strongest color when they turned to guiding the onrush of emigrants along trails they had broken, and bequeathed the remnants of their craft to decorous half-breeds in the Canadian north woods.

PHILOSOPHERS

BY H. M. KALLEN

THE porter was a college graduate. He had observed me fumbling with Kerr's translation of Plato's "Republic" and had made an occasion to cause me to know that he, too, had heard of Plato and read him. The flaccid-faced commercial travellers who mostly use this flyer, which was taking me from New York to Chicago, were calling him Sam and exhibiting toward him an old familiarity, that especial familiarity which is called forth by waiters, bootblacks, newsboys and porters once you have commanded a service from them. I could see that Sam's—his name was really Francis; Francis Columbus Sprayer, he told me, was the name on his bachelor's diploma—that Sam's genial servility had an aura of scorn; that he regarded himself as playing a part in his relations to the patrons on whose tips his living depended; that what he thought of himself had no connection with his work for the Pullman Company. In his own mind he was leading a double life. The real one was with the Negro community in Chicago, of which he was a distinguished and somewhat withdrawn member. His ruminations and fantasies on his trips were, I found, concerned with that, and with the scraps of reading he had picked up in college. I gathered that he felt rather removed from his own people also.

And many other things I gathered. Not all at the once, but in the many snatches of the conversation he came always to resume in the intervals of his duties, after I had asked him once to sit down opposite me and to discourse to me about Plato and the Platonic philosophy. What he actually knew about both was false or negligible; his exhibition was as bad as that of any son of Japheth who had gone through a college. But there was the native salt of philosophy in him; the personal savor of a theory of life and a secure sense of his own destiny. His rambling discourse of scraps of doctrine and Brobdignagian phrases revealed a certain poise and security of mind; the tone of philosophic wisdom such as can never come from mere schooling.

It is a quality always of born philosophers, and is sometimes hardily won through experience. Anxiety, fear, anger, and discontent—all the smouldering resentment of the lighter-colored among our educated dark-skinned fellow-Americans, such as one almost naturally expects—all these things Sam's mood was particularly free from. That tone, that temper which the insecurities of life automatically create, seemed entirely lacking in him. He gave you the feel of a serene assurance without any hinterland of anxiety or foreground of doubt.

In the course of the day I felt free to ask him about his plan of life. It culminated, I learned, in a somewhat magniloquent station among his own people: the position of a college-bred Garvey. He told me that as he spoke about the weather.

"Why," I asked, "are you so sure?"

"Ise de sevent' son of a sevent' son," he replied with a transluminating smile, dropping into the patois of his people.

There was the key to his fate, the heart of his reality! There was the alpha and omega of his education and the salvation of his philosophy!

When thousands were dying of the flu and millions went about anxiously from this remedy or prophylactic to that, seeking a cure or charm against the disease, my acquaintance, Walter Potter, followed the routine of his daily life as if there had never been such a plague in the whole wide world. He was a business man with an office somewhere down-town, where he bought and sold cotton waste. He had all the qualities one is led by the newspapers, the magazines and the novelists to expect of an American business man. He was as standardized as Babbitt and as distinctive as Babbitt's maker; a Republican in politics, a member of the Chamber of Commerce, a Rotarian and an anti-Bolshevik. The New York Post was his evening newspaper and the readymade, dull girl-and-music show his occasional diversion. He hated labor unions without knowing anything about them, and he believed that all foreigners should be made over into his own nearly perfect image or expelled from the country. Bolshevik was his term of ultimate reproach. He declared that Coolidge was the greatest President the country had ever had, and his admiration for Mr. Mellon was without bounds. Mr. Potter was, you will see, right. From the standpoint of those who decide what majorities shall think, he was as truly a 100 % American as could be fabricated. And yet—

Well, there was no passion, no drive, no urge about his rightness. He was not a missionary about it. He did not seek to confirm it by requiring others to accept it or by denouncing them when they did not do so. He would state his opinions freely as the occasion called for them, but he would always, I noticed, state them serenely, with an assurance as matter of fact, as natural, as inevitable, as his being there to state them. Dispute, contradiction, seemed to have no effect on him. When crowded into a logical corner he would smile a little pityingly, as if he were sorry for you, and shut up. But you could see that he had shed your argument as a duck sheds water and that his own inability did not mean to him an inability at all. It was as if he saw something that you did not see, a vision that set him quite beyond the reach of mortal mind.

I used to wonder about it during my chance talks with him at the lunch table in the club, and on an occasional walk up-town after the day's work. It was when the flu became epidemic that I found out. We had been commiserating over bereaved and suffering friends. Their state was the more a pity he told me, serenely, because it was so unnecessary. Now, he and his family, as I knew, were going about with impunity, and without any precautions whatsoever. For twenty years they had not had a moment's illness and so long as they were in their right minds, they would not.

"Your 'right minds'," I said. "Do you mean you are Christian Scientists?"

"Yes," he assented. He and his family were followers of the Truth. Disease was Mortal Error. Misfortunes, all the evil the world ever thought it suffered from, were Mortal Error, just mistaken thinking, to be dissipated once and for all by the acceptance, the acknowledgment, of the sole oneness and reality of Spirit, Truth, Goodness, Health, as taught by Mother Eddy. He had not always been a "scientist." Twenty years ago, in the first years of his marriage, he had been as other men. Things had gone badly—business and such; he and his wife quarrelled, and it looked for a time as if they would separate. She was very nervous until he fell ill—horrible rheumatic fever mostly, that no doctor they went to could cure. Finally a gossip of his wife's brought them to a healer. They began to read "scientist" books, and even before they had grasped the great principle of Providence, he began feeling better and his wife stopped being nervous. In three weeks, under the tutelage of the healer, he was well. Since then they had prospered, both in health and wealth.

A doctor had never crossed their threshold; there had not been an unkind word between him and Mrs. Potter. Such difficulties as had arisen—and this world of Error brings many—they had been able to face with the serene assurance that they were only Error, only illusion; so they were overcome and the family kept doing well. . . .

That evil is unreal is a mistake and cannot hurt; this is the key to the Potter fate, the heart of the Potter vision. There is the alpha and omega of the Potter philosophy.

III

Once, during a brief lecture tour in the Middle West, I was snowbound for three days in a small town whose chief industry was a small college. My theme was philosophical, and my host was, by the homeopathic convention of hospitality, the professor of philosophy. Until I saw him, the night of the lecture, he had been unknown to me even by name. At the station, when he met my train, his appearance confirmed my worst fears. He looked the typical American professor, and the typical American professor looks a semi-literate pedagogue who communicates to bored boys and girls, preoccupied with surgent adolescence, orthodoxies out of a text-book acceptable to their parents. His teaching follows the rule of a set administrative routine, while his mind and feelings are among the exigencies of the usual academic backbitings and the sordidnesses of maintaining wife, children and station at a salary a plumber's apprentice would scorn, and a bricklayer wouldn't turn over in bed for. The typical American professor wears, behind his glasses, the anxious look of a fussing housewife; his clothes are usually shabby, his body is no better nourished than his mind, and shows as little familiarity with activity. Until the daughter, if there is one, grows up, he helps his wife with the dishes after meals. If he is the professor of philosophy, he substitutes for the president in the college chapel of a Sunday.

Jonathan Sillcox Smith, Ph.D. (Chicago), looked every inch the professor, and of philosophy. And his house, to which he took me, looked every inch the professorial house—in doubtful repair outside; inside, with faded walls, hesitant plumbing, creaky furniture, windows that would not stay open and could never quite shut, so that they rattled through the drafty night. The house was a concretion of the years of bareness, of sordid hardships, and small ambitions which everywhere pertain to the American professor's life. The colleagues and their wives who came together for dinner were like the house. Talk was freighted with the habitual themes and topics of the academic Main Street. And the professor of philosophy bore his part. His remarks as chairman—he presided at my lecture—did nothing to mitigate the sense of type he imparted. "Well," I reflected as he talked, "a few more hours, and I shall soon be out of it."

But the snow which had been falling all day thought otherwise, and it was a hundred hours before I was out of it. Most of those hours I spent in the drab Smith house, in the constant company of the drab Smith. There was little professional talk between us, but much, very much, about the world and Professor Smith. And the talk revealed that the professor of philosophy, the retailer of orthodoxies out of a book to callow minds impervious to the book and him, was in the keeping of a vision that transfigured his drab life and drabber work into a serene adventure, and for him transluminated his classroom platitudes with the quiet radiance of assured insight. The posture of his spirit kept reminding me of that of the Pullman porter and that of the seller of cotton waste. The professor of philosophy, by one of those happy paradoxes that sometimes overtake you, was also a philosopher.

The stuff of his insight contained nothing freshly imaginative, momentous or exciting. It was an old story to the generations for which science is an infallible tradition and the laws of nature are the courses of fate. It was a tale of the origin and destiny of man that was in its anatomy first told by Democritus, then repeated with piety and passion by Epicurus and Lucretius, and then forgotten during a millennium and a half, to be repeated at last as the natural commonplace materialism that the insight of science into the character and processes of the world we live in so often comes to. Most of this materialism is an orthodoxy of the modern mind, regularly confessed, but, as a belief, as regularly rejected by the mind's incurable romanticism.

What made it a living vision instead of a formal confession when rehearsed by Jonathan Sillcox Smith, Ph.D. (Chicago), was the tone of authentic assurance with which it was communicated. It came to you as the faith the professor lived by, and you could see that it set the drabness and dullness of his existence in a cosmic perspective which, without altering one drab item in his drab biography, imparted to it inwardness, dignity and worth. His faith in science and in the method of science enabled him to acquiesce in the implications of its meanings for his own existence. He was enduring his life's dreariness and squalor cheerfully and not without zest. He could look to the sordid routine and petty struggles that were likely to be the sum of his days with serenity and assurance. Because of his vision he was ready for them, and for the greater disasters of disease or loss of job or death.

In a word, he was a philosopher because, by his sufficiently commonplace vision, he was taking life "philosophically." He and Francis Columbus Sprayer and Walter Potter, for all their variance, were brothers under their skins. Each was a philosopher. Each was a philosopher because each had a talisman of words wherewith he was enabled to convert the uncertain and dangerous drama of experience into the secure order of inevitable fate.

GOLD AND GOURDES

BY K. C. McINTOSH

THE occupation of Haiti by the Marines in 1915 was the first instance of an entirely new American policy in the handling of tropical revolutions. In the old days of "gunboating the banana ports," radio was limited in range and not dependable. Mail was spasmodic and slow; and cables were so costly that commanders were expected to report only important developments. This made the little gunboat skipper the real arbiter of every situation. He was usually a commander in rank, sometimes only a lieutenant-commander. So advanced an officer as a captain seldom saw any of the West Indies except Guantanamo and "Hungry Gulf."

The old system worked beautifully. The gunboat skipper was old enough to think and young enough to still enjoy it. His three glittering sleeve-stripes left him at no disadvantage in his solemn conferences with swarthy generals, ministers of state and Presidents de jure or de facto; but they were not heavy nor wide enough to prohibit his discussing cocktails of an evening with an opposition editor, a hotel-keeper or even a cab-driver. So he always knew two sets of facts, the real ones, and those that the local government wished him to know.

Latin-American politics in those high days was different also. The nations of Europe had many small investments down there in railroads or government bonds. At the same time, many fruit, mahogany, and mining concessions remained unpledged. The party in power commonly paid its foreign interest for a while, and refrained from oppressing foreign concessionaires unduly. But as its normal expectation of life drew toward the inevitable end, it gradually yielded to an irresistible impulse to keep its revenues where they were most comfortable. Payments to Europe fell in arrears and taxes on exports mounted with a rapidity in exact ratio to the mounting hunger of the Outs. About the time that the foreign fruit, mineral and lumber companies switched their "goodwill money" from the Ins to the Outs, the European chancelleries would politely inform Washington that unless their arrears of interest were paid, they would be forced to take steps. So Washington, with the Monroe Doctrine as its gospel and annoyance in its heart, dispatched gunboats to make step-taking by Europe unnecessary. Thus we sailed southward to "protect American and foreign interests and preserve order." During the whole process, the common man went peacefully about his business or took a pleasant vacation by joining the army of his political choice. Never do I remember a case, in those days, of an American firing a shot in malice, nor of one American casualty; although in one classic instance our gunboats actually administered the government of a long sea-coast for a considerable period of time, keeping the two warring factions outside of even the smallest towns, arresting drunks, and giving dances with the municipal band.

But Haiti was always different. The Outs never disbanded there, but, after a losing fight, ran from Port au Prince to the hills. The Ins were bad winners, and a successful revolution always ended in a series of executions amounting almost to a massacre. Unlike the peon of other turbulent republics, the poor Haitian farmer suffered severely. The tax-collector would barely be out of sight with the best half of his cattle before the bandit Outs would sweep down from the hills and seize the rest, setting fire to his half-ripened crop for good measure. No Haitian President could count on a hasty retirement to Paris with his savings. Most of them died in the streets of Port au Prince. Interest payments fell off rapidly, for year after year both factions warred on the producing peasantry until revenues and taxable exports almost ceased. When President Sam was dragged from the French Legation, literally sliced into bits and thrown to the lean street dogs, something had to be done.

On our side circumstances gradually changed. The gunboat had been replaced by the large, armored ship, the commander by an admiral. Efficient radio tied the admiral with a snug tether to the State, War, and Navy Building on Pennsylvania Avenue. The long agitation for peace had sowed strange seeds in the minds of grinning politicos, and cautious experiment had convinced them that Americans were merely a harmless noise. It was time for guns,—ours or Europe's. There stood the Monroe Doctrine. The Marines went in.

That Military Occupation has been damned too often in the public prints for another version of it to be worth the effort. Inevitably, when a young Marine first sees a tent-mate distributed over a quarter-mile of jungle trail, he forgets to count a hundred before he strikes back, and he prefers that his opponents do not surrender. But during the period of actual hostilities, the real picture that hangs in the memory is of the trail down the mountain from Grand Rivière, lined with hundreds of shouting, singing, black skeletons, throwing flowers and weeping with joy at the extermination of the hill bandits who had starved them for nearly six years. Whoever else may disapprove of the American occupation, the Haitian peasant was hysterically in favor of it.

II

After the struggle came reconstruction. The real puzzle in this phase, the villain of the piece, was the Haitian gourde, supposedly the standard money. It was totally unsecured by metallic reserves, and it circulated only because the peasant would have to be able to read figures to use any other money intelligently. Metallic money was out of the question, for long ago the farmer had found that the silver wash could be pushed off the lead disk with one thrust of a black thumb, and that the town storekeepers would not accept it. The paper gourde at any rate would buy something, although how much never seemed predictable. It was easy to use, for though the bits of gaudy paper were marked 1, 2, 5, 20, or perhaps 100, the Haitians treated them impartially. One piece of paper, one gourde. Simplicity itself!

A New York financier of international reputation had declared that the stabilization of the gourde was a hopeless task. From the outside it certainly seemed so. Once inside, however, the key to the puzzle was discovered by the shrewdness of Captain Charles Conard, of the Navy Supply Corps. It was a simple thing, as real keys always are. The gourde was no more the standard money of Haiti than the copper cent is the standard in the United States. Fluctuating exchange was profitable to the Ins, as we later discovered; but years before, the canny Haitian government had begun valuing imports and exports and imposing tariffs in American dollars. The tax laws first recognized the new standard by specifying that some imposts could be paid in American money (called "gold" for short), and then that part of them must be paid in gold. The later laws insisted upon an all-gold payment.

One eminent American publicist, in an article scarifying the Occupation, became indignant over our stabilization of the gourde for two reasons: first, the Haitians did not want it stabilized; and second, as the gourde used to regularly touch a high point of fifty cents, we robbed them by freezing it at twenty. We who were there can name the source of this gentleman's information,—we have listened to its cultured French and incisive English, as it alternately pleaded, stormed and threatened against stabilization. In our justification, I can only plead the facts.

Captain Conard, who was the real brains behind the financial reconstruction, arrived in Port au Prince about a month after the Occupation began. The first tentative steps toward financial as well as political stability had already been taken by Admiral Caperton and Commander (now Admiral) Charles Morris. As Admiral Caperton's flag was transferred from the U. S. S. Washington to the Tennessee, Commander Morris transferred to me his "additional duty" as Force supply officer, and sixteen one-thousand-dollar bills. As bills of that size are not often found in a ship's safe, my amazement was dissipated only when Commander Morris told me that the sixteen bills were exchange clubs. When the rate was sliding too strongly against Haiti, I was supposed to solemnly deposit one or more of these bills in the Bank of Haiti, thereby increasing the Republic's gold supply. When the bull market in gourdes became obstreperous, I was to draw the bills out again. And actually, to a limited extent, this puerile process worked! Big bills were used to insure getting them back—the bank had no customers to whom a thousand-dollar bill was of any use.

Ten officers of the Navy Supply Corps came in the Tennessee with Captain Conard, and under his direction as Administrator of Customs they followed close behind the Marine occupation of the entry-ports, rapidly assuming the duties of collectors of customs and captains of the port in Cap Haitien, Port de Paix, Port au Prince, Jeremie, Gonaive, St. Marc, Petit Goave, Miragoane, Jacmel and Les Cayes. All of these officers started out to greet their new and strange duties armed with French dictionaries and typewriters, and instructed to carry out the Haitian customs laws to the last letter. If the customs-house to which each was assigned contained no copy of the Loi sur les Douanes de la Republique, he was to report the fact and use his own judgment until Captain Conard located and sent him a copy.

In order to insure accurate check on both the receipts and the expenditures of the Haitian government—all receipts were at that time customs, no taxes being collectable—receipts were deposited to a trust fund called the Admiral Caperton Account in the Bank of Haiti. National expenditures were budgeted without changing the number of offices nor the salaries authorized by Haitian law. The budget was audited and certified by Captain Conard, approved by Admiral Caperton, and expenditures incurred thereunder were paid from this account. The only expenditures added to those already authorized by the Haitians themselves were for sanitation and for the expenses incident to organizing the Haitian constabulary. Public works were later undertaken as receipts warranted, and President D'Artignave agreed. Considerable unemployment was relieved in this manner.

But still loomed the bugbear of exchange, disorganizing the most careful budgets, setting at naught all plans for amortization of the national debt. The game of predatory politics had become impossible. There remained only exchange, by which honest politicos might prosper until the Americans got off the lid of the Treasury. Exchange naturally became the accepted game, and the gourde went wild.

III

Recognizing almost from the start the fact already noted—that the standard money of Haiti was gold and that the gourdes were merely token media of exchange, a limited amount of legal-tender small change and nothing else,—Captain Conard found his problem simplified. With all exports and imports measured in dollars, it was apparent to him that the fluctuations of the circulating gourdes, where they were not artificial, must be based on the quantity present on the Port au Prince Exchange. It was also apparent that once stabilized and held long enough to accustom the peasant to a steady gourde, gourdes could no more fluctuate than a 25-cent piece can fluctuate under a stable dollar. But how to stabilize it, and at what point?

Historical studies showed that in any given year, while there were several periods of small fluctuation, there was one high peak. Once a year, gourdes were two to the dollar for a short period. From this peak there was a gradually accelerated slump lasting about six weeks, during which the gourde fell to eight to the dollar and stayed there for a long time. Through the year, its average was about eighteen cents.

In the days when the first honest silver gourdes had been issued, they had been equal in value to a pre-war franc, 19.3 cents. To save arithmetical difficulties in converting gourdes to gold, Captain Conard considered five to the dollar the proper point of stability. This was easy to calculate, was halfway between 2 and 8, was a little above the year-round average, and actually a fraction higher than the value of the old metal gourde.

The big, sudden rise of the gourde was found to occur when the coffee crop ripened, and discovery of its cause bore out Captain Conard's opinion that the price of gourdes was a Port au Prince price and was not even Haiti-wide. When his coffee was ready for market, the farmer threw the bags across donkey-backs and went into the capital to sell. On the docks his coffee was worth three gold dollars a bag. Gold dollars meant nothing to him, however. He wanted gourdes, and three dollars had to be translated into them. The trouble was that he was not alone. Perhaps thirty thousand one- and two-bag coffee farmers altogether flocked into Port au Prince demanding gourdes, which rose and rose.

For his bag of coffee, the farmer was paid six gourdes.

Then simultaneously, thirty thousand small farmers, home again, began to think of the beer of Port au Prince and of a new calico dress for 'Tite' Tine or a machete for 'P'tit Boy.' They went in again on their annual buying pilgrimage and gourdes flowed into the Bank of Haiti. Instead of the three dollars' worth of goods for which he could have exchanged his bag of coffee, his six gourdes bought only three twenty-five-cent bottles of German beer, and he had nothing left. He tramped home with an empty belly, unless 'Tite' Tine played Tamar by the roadside to earn him the price of a corncake and a swig of rum. When he wanted them, gourdes cost fifty cents. When he wanted something else, they were less than thirteen cents apiece. For town prices were invariably set by the number of dollars the goods had cost; but the gourdes he must pay with were the intrinsically worthless playthings of his political masters, the Ins. The problem began to clear up.

Two things were necessary: a way to control the quantity of gourdes floating in and out of the Bank in Port au Prince, and a more general distribution of gourdes over the country at all times at a steady price. The answers were found right in existing Haitian law. In every little village of the Republic resided at least one government employé, theoretically enjoying a salary set by law. Perhaps in the past government pay-wagons had been looted or government paymasters had absconded. Anyhow, the custom had grown up of paying with feuilles, or pay-tickets, payable only at the Bank of Haiti. The constable at Sale Trou had no time to trudge in once a month to Port au Prince—the journey was a hard ten days each way,—so he took his ticket to the local storekeeper and discounted it. From Sale Trou, the ticket started across country, settling traders' balances. In due time, after five or six discounts, it reached the hands of a city broker and was cashed at the bank at its face value. The man who earned the pay seldom received over forty per cent of it. That was custom.

But the law said that the constable "shall receive;" so the first change in departmental orders made by the unreasoning Americans was the abolition of feuilles. Startled brokers, among them leading statesmen, lawyers and physicians, protested violently. "How," they demanded, "will you prevent robbery of funds in transit?" "We will send the money in charge of a Marine sergeant," answered the captain; and the incident was closed. Astounded constables and petty port-clerks all over the outlying districts found their pay miraculously more than doubled, and began to doubt the stories of American rapacity and plunder. Gourdes in respectable normal amount flowed naturally in and out of the villages as well as to the capital city.

The other half of the problem had to be worked out in Port au Prince; and the government servant in the capital yelled long and loud in the process. He had never suffered from the feuille system,—he cashed his own at the bank,—but his longing eyes had watched the big operators of his political camp playing with the gourde. He was too small to affect the exchange market, but he was a good henchman; so at his request a law had been passed to the effect that he could be paid either in gourdes or gold. As the market swung, he stated his preference at the pay-window. This very law was a potent weapon ready to Captain Conard's hand, and he was quick to seize it. He knew that if the rate could be held stationary through just one coffee season, all Haiti would insist upon dependable money for all time, and perspiring business men and budget clerks could awake from the nightmare of a generation past. The Customs Administration entered the situation with a crash; and the Admiral Caperton Account in the Bank was big enough to exert a heavy pressure. Were gourdes rising too high? Then every government employé from the President down was paid in gourdes and the market was eased. Were they sinking too low? Then salaries were paid in gold and the gourdes were buried in the Admiral Caperton Account. Meanwhile, under the Customs Law, both gourdes and gold were again flowing into the treasury in rapidly increasing quantities as banditry was wiped out and crops ripened.

The politicians and speculators became seriously alarmed. Exchange was becoming so sluggish that they could hardly count on doubling their money in a year's time. In a body they descended on the Administrator, on the Admiral, on General Waller, on any American who would listen. Reason after reason against stabilization was countered and abolished by Captain Conard's brusque knowledge of finance and thorough understanding of the situation. Finally the last appeal was made: "You are depriving prominent men of their business. They are used to seeing the money rise and fall and count on it. It is an economic crime to interfere!" But the Americans were deaf.

The last stand of the speculators brought about the highest comedy spot in the entire history of the Occupation. In desperation, a plan was laid to corner gourdes, the supply of which was known with fair accuracy, and after shooting the price up, to dump them and cause a heavy break. It was risky, perhaps, and called for concerted effort; but if they could once shake the Administrator's control, could whirl the market away from him, it would take months for him to again tranquilize the rate. By that time, the speculators would be ready to do it again.

But once more luck was on the American side. Before the Occupation, the government had contracted with the bank for a new issue of notes "to replace the worn circulation." The notes had been printed in the United States, and word was received that five hundred thousand gourdes had actually been shipped. Their issue would simply have cheapened the currency, at that time already too low; so the collector at Port au Prince, Commander H. E. Stevens, was warned of their coming and directed to seize them. The ship upon which they were due was inspected from truck to keelson without result, until Commander Stevens noticed an entry in the manifest: "10 cases stationery; location, mail room." Such carefully guarded stationery aroused the Commander's curiosity, and so he investigated the boxes. He found the new gourdes. They had been lying in the customs-house, unsigned and so totally worthless, for over a month when the speculators staged their attempted coup. Everybody knew of their presence there.

IV

Captain Conard had been slowly fighting the gourde up from its bottom figure of eight to the dollar and it had reached a point just under $5\frac{1}{2}$. The conspirators watched with a smile—the Americans were saving them so much labor and risk. Suddenly they went to work. Instead of climbing slowly, the gourde began to jump. The market closed strongly bullish at around 5.10. Next morning it opened with a whoop and before eleven o'clock gourdes were 4.50 and still rising. Something had to be done quickly, not only to check the unhealthy rise but to force the gourde down to the twenty-cent normal again. Captain Conard reached for the telephone.

Two full companies of Marines reported on the double to Commander Stevens at the customs-house. Ten carts and at least fifty laborers mobilized suddenly. With straining grunts and shouts of mutual encouragement, as many laborers as could get hold of each hoisted out those ten boxes of worthless, unsigned paper notes and loaded them, one box at a time, on the ten carts. The Marines covered the wagons on every side. The bugle blared "Forward!" The longest way was taken to insure maximum publicity. Arrived at the bank, Marines with fixed bayonets faced about, guarding completely the heavy cases as the shouting workmen tugged them off the carts. Finally they were all inside the bank.

Word flew to the exchange that the government was even now signing that half-million gourdes for issue. Each appalled member of the pool tried secretly to get out from under before the break came. By closing time the gourde was down to 4.90. Next morning, with a frightened and quivering market, a few judicious bill payments brought the rate down to five, and it has been there ever since.

To the best of my knowledge, ten unopened boxes of mouldering, unsigned paper notes still rest in the cellar of the Bank of Haiti. But they served their turn!

SOMETHING NOBLE

BY PARKHURST WHITNEY

A FARMER found Gooseline's John asleep in the snow, as his team labored through the drifts that wintry afternoon. The farmer tried to rouse him from the deep stupor; failing, he hauled the old man into his bobsleigh and went on his way. When he got to town he stopped in front of the store where Judge Levi Stark sold farm tools and dispensed what currently passed for justice.

"Lyin' right alongside the road," he said, stamping into the presence of the law. "The hosses might 'a stepped right on him."

"Where've I heard that story before?" grunted the judge, who liked his joke. The hangers-on laughed and consolidated their positions around the stove.

"Well, he must 'a drunk a bar'l of it this time," said the farmer, rubbing his frosted whiskers. "He was asleep when I found him, and he's asleep now. Be durned if I can wake him up."

Judge Stark, his court, and the farmer adjourned to the snowy street to look at the sleeper. Gooseline's John lay where he had been deposited, on the bare bottom of the bobsleigh. He was a stout, square-built man; but his present enormous bulk suggested layers of clothing underneath the shabby, greenish overcoat. His face, covered with grayish stubble, reflected the cold color of the sky toward which it was turned.

Judge Stark clamped a huge, freckled paw on the old man's shoulder and shook him roughly.

"Wake up, John!" he commanded.

"Whoosh!" The breath came out of him in jets of white, smoky vapor, but he made no answer.

"If I shook him once, I shook him twenty times, Judge," said the farmer. "I might just as well 'a been shakin' a bag of meal."

The crowd around the bobsleigh was growing; merchants, their clerks and their customers, and children coming home from school. Various ways of rousing Gooseline's John were suggested.

"Kick his feet——"

"Get a man on each side of him 'nd walk him——"

"Slap him——"

"The way to start a balky horse is to set a fire under him——"

"Shucks! You don't need a fire; just touch a match to John's breath——"

"Why, the's only one sure way o' wakin' old John," said a drawling voice.

"How's that?"

"Just stick a half pint under his nose!"

"I guess we better have Doc Stanley," said Judge Stark. He looked around the circle of faces, and crooked his finger at young Dick Cary. "Here, bub! You run get your Uncle Charlie."

"Yessir," said Dick eagerly, and went off at a gallop.

The crowd continued to grow. The farmer blanketed his horses and began to tell the story of the finding of Gooseline's John.

"Why, you know that piece o' road this side o' Henry Wynkoop's?" he was saying. "It drifts bad right along there——"

"Found him right along there, hey?"

"No, sir, I didn't. Nowheres near there. S'I say, the road drifts bad right along there, and if I'd a done what I was thinkin' of doin' I wouldn't 'a found him a-tall. I wouldn't thought o' startin' for town in the fust place if it hadn't been for the woman. We been snowed in out our way so long—well, she says to-day, 'One of us has got to git out o' this house, and I ain't goin' to be the one with this sore throat.' Well, sir, I hitched up and started out right after dinner, but when I got's far 's that piece o' road this side o' Henry Wynkoop's I pretty near turned back. Thinks I, let the woman jaw if she wants to. I won't ask hosses to break their necks——"

The farmer, sensing his own importance in the drama, was with difficulty hurried ahead to the moment of discovery.

"Well, sir, ain't it funny the way things happen? There I was—no more notion of comin' to town than anything 'til the woman got it into her head, and there I was—ready to turn back just about soon's I got started. And I would 'a turned back too, but all the while I was turnin' it over in my mind the team was a flounderin' along, and before I knew it they'd pulled through, and there I was slippin' along easy's you please not more'n half a mile t'other side the Lehigh tracks——"

The farmer had to pause for breath; his mind, quickened by the obvious curiosity of the crowd, was working too fast for his tongue.

"Well, sir, I dunno as I'd 'a seen him then if the nigh hoss hadn't kind o' shield. I looked up to see what was the matter and I see somethin' side o' the road that looked kind o' like a man. Well, sir, I was mighty surprised I can tell you. 'Whoa!' I says, and I jumped out——"

The story grew more elaborate and confused with repetition; often, to please a late arrival, the farmer would break off his narrative and begin again, before he had finished telling how he had shaken and shaken and might just as well have been shaking a bag of meal, for all the good it did.

Dr. Stanley arrived, accompanied by Banty McMahon, his driver, and young Dick Cary. The ring about the bobsleigh parted, but closed quickly around the doctor and his party. There was a good deal of struggling for advantage on the outer edges, but a respectful silence was observed as the physician's fingers pressed the wrist of Gooseline's John. The silence deepened when he laid his ear close to the old man's breast.

"Goin' to sleep it off all right, Doc?" asked one, when Dr. Stanley raised at last an inscrutable face.

"Not this side of hell, I guess."

The doctor's voice was not unkind, though the words were brutal. He was always a harassed, overtired man these snowbound days, when the native stuffed himself with pancakes and pork meat and slept in an airtight bedroom.

The laconic diagnosis caused the crowd to press forward with a concerted movement. So! Gooseline's John was not sleeping off a drunk, but sleeping his life away! The faces that stared down at him, that twisted and turned for a better view, seemed drained of all feeling; as if all their senses had been concentrated in their eyes.

Only the farmer showed emotion. He sought the doctor's ear.

"Doc, I've got quite a trip ahead o' me," he mumbled, trying to speak confidentially. "And I've got quite a little tradin' to do——"

"I'm not stopping you," said Dr. Stanley. His eyes sought the bulky figure of the law, and he addressed his next words to Judge Stark. "There's nothing I can do, Judge," he said wearily. "If you—if somebody just makes him comfortable——"

The crowd, once so voluble in suggesting ways of wakening the sleeper, was silent.

"I've got a mighty sick boy out Plainsville way," said the doctor, more pointedly.

"Well, we might put him in the town hall," said Judge Stark slowly.

The doctor shrugged. "All right. I'll look in on him later."

II

The crowd continued to grow. The mid-Winter day, moving as slowly an hour earlier as the feet of a runner in a dream, had been miraculously enlivened by the dying presence of Gooseline's John. The town hall, at first frigid with the clammy frigidity of an empty, unheated building, grew comfortable with the warmth of many human bodies; and its stale reek was overcome by the heartier kitchen smells that clung tenaciously to heavy woolens.

Gooseline's John lay just below the stage, on a cot that had been brought from the quarters of the Hook and Ladder Company. A blanket covered his thick body to the chin, but at the foot a pair of clumsy felt boots protruded, like two squat black posts set in gray soil.

There was a constant movement about the cot. The ring of faces changed, but the ring itself was not broken. Young Dick Cary, who expected to follow his uncle's profession, hovered always near the sleeper's head; counting his noisy respirations, taking his pulse endlessly. Those who broke in upon his calculations received a sober, enigmatical shake of the head. Mothers passed by with their children, thinking perhaps that the spectacle would ever after stay the hand that was tempted to lift the wine cup. Mrs. Orlo Link, village scourge of evil, passed with a gleam in her small, black eyes that seemed to say: "Thus perish all cider suckers!"

From the background arose a confused murmur and scraping of chairs. The cheap, unpainted chairs were being hauled from their stacks along the walls, so that those who had gorged their eyes could sit down and talk of the dying man's life and works. Gooseline's John was a familiar figure around the countryside. A wanderer from farm to farm, from threshing to pig-killing; often drunk but never ugly; a rustic playboy.

"Didn't he have some other name?" asked Eddie Patt. Already they spoke of him in the past tense.

"Not t'I know of——"

"What's that?" It was the limber-tongued Fred Green, the village shoe merchant, entering the group. "Why, sure he had another name. It was Henselpecker—John Henselpecker was his right name."

"My, what a funny name!" tittered Ernestine Stiggins.

"The Dutchmen used to call him Gooseline's John because he used to live with the Gorselines when he was a young fellow. I guess Gooseline was as near's the Dutchmen could come to Gorseline. But his real name——"

Fred Green lowered his voice for details too indelicate for the virginal ears of Ernestine Stiggins.

"But his name should 'a been Feldner. Why sure! Old Johann Feldner was his father. Old Johann was the king pin of the Dutchmen when he was alive. He settled the first lot of 'em in this part of the country, and what he said went. They say when he wanted a Dutchman's girl he just took her. They say he had more bastards than you could shake a stick at."

Eddie Patt bared his buck teeth in a pleased leer. He was plainly disappointed when the subject was changed.

"John was a good-natured cuss, I'll say that for him. Just give him enough cider and he didn't care what you paid him. They say when farmers would try to get him to work for 'em he'd say, 'How many parrels cider you got in?' He didn't like to work for no one-barrel farmers. Five-barrel farmers was about what John liked."

"Yeh! I guess five barrels would just about suit John. Say! I've seen him so full——"

"Shucks! what I'd like to know is, did anybody ever see him cold sober?"

"Yeh! Guess that's right. Seein' John full ain't anything to brag about——"

Slowly the crowd began to dwindle. The darkness that gloomed outside the tall windows of the town hall, the gas jets that began to purr around the solitary chandelier were reminders that life had duties beyond watching the failing breath of Gooseline's John. The babble and the shuffling died away. The night chill and the defeated odors crept out of their hiding places. When the whistle of the village factory blew the scale at six o'clock, there remained at the bedside only Fred Green, Eddie Patt and Dick Cary.

"I s pose somebody ought to stay," ventured Fred Green. "You fellows goin' to stay?"

"I c'n stay a while," said Eddie Patt.

Dick Cary merely nodded. He felt that it was unnecessary to say anything; doctors, and those who were to be doctors, always stayed.

"Well, I tell you," said Fred Green. "I'll go back and let my clerk go to supper. Then I'll pick up a snack at Jake Fischer's and come back here. I'll bring you some sandwiches."

"Tell Jake to put a lot o' mustard on mine," said Eddie Patt.

A gust of icy air swept through the hall, followed by the rocketing slam of the double doors. The watchers turned to see George Emmett, chief of the village fire department, stepping briskly toward them.

"Say, boys, you'll have to get him out o' here," he began abruptly. "We got to rehearse for the minstrel show to-night."

"He's failing fast," said Dick Cary, trying to put on the professional manner of his uncle.

"Well, you'll have to get him out just the same," insisted the chief. "We got to rehearse."

"That's easy enough to say," grumbled Dick Cary. "Where'll we take him?"

"I don't know, but you got to get him out o' here."

There was a dictatorial note in the chief's voice that Dick resented; that was not the way to speak to one who would be, if he was not now, the sole director of death-bed scenes. "I didn't put him in here," he said sullenly.

"Well, it don't make no difference who put him in here," retorted the chief. "What I say is, he can't stay here. We're payin' for the hall, and we got to rehearse."

"How about the lock-up?" suggested the resourceful and diplomatic Fred Green. "Feeley ought to be on duty pretty soon. He'll have a key to the lock-up."

It was agreed that Fred Green was to find the village constable and send him to the town hall.

"Ever see anybody die?" asked Eddie Patt, when he and Dick Cary were alone.

Dick hated to admit his inexperience. "Uh—well, not exackly—"

Eddie Patt ignored the quibbling reply. He hitched his chair nearer the cot and fastened his rabbit eyes on the quick rise and fall of the sleeper's chest.

"I never see anybody die before," he said.

III

The lock-up was a dugout underneath one corner of the town hall. It contained four cells, two on each side of a narrow corridor. At one end of the corridor a narrow transom window provided ventilation when it was open. At the other end there was an open space for a pot-bellied stove and woodbox.

Gooseline's John lay on his cot in the corridor, his felt boots facing the open space. The breath was still in him, but the supply was running low. When the gas jet above his head flickered fitfully, the dancing shadows created an illusion of animation on his heavy, unshaven face. But it was only illusion.

The watchers—Cary, Green, and the buck-toothed Eddie Patt—sat in the shadow near the stove. Now and then the older pair nipped at a bottle that Fred Green had brought with the sandwiches. Now and then Eddie Patt threatened to go home; a threat which he always failed to put into execution.

"Oh, you better stay it out," Fred Green was saying now, as he had said several times before. "I guess it won't be long now."

"Wouldn't surprise me none if he pulled through," argued Eddie Patt. "A Dutchman's about as tough as they make 'em."

"Oh, he'll die," Dick Cary assured him. "Uncle Charlie said so. He told me so when he came into the town hall to-night, just before we brought John down here."

Eddie Patt sniffed. "I hear he told old Mis' Wheatridge she was goin' to die, too. Doctors don't know it all."

"Why, you know why he told her that, don't you?" broke in the all-wise Fred Green. "Why, she was the one that got it into her head she was goin' to die. Soon's the doc agreed with her she changed her mind. Why, sure! That's the way that was."

Dick Cary flashed Fred Green a grateful glance. Was there ever a doctor as smart as his hero!

"No, I guess John's done for, all right." Fred Green shook his head, and looked long at the still figure under the gray blanket. Suddenly he rose and went to the foot of the cot.

"What is it?" asked Dick Cary excitedly.

"Those felt boots wore well," said the shoe merchant calmly. "I sold 'em to him way long before Christmas. I said then I'd never had a better lot o' felts."

"Better take 'em back, Fred," snickered Eddie Patt. "John won't need 'em where he's goin'."

"They're warm, all right. Warm as warm."

"It's a good thing he was dressed warm," said Dick Cary, after his flurry had passed. "He's got on three shirts, and two pairs of pants, and a coat under his overcoat. If he hadn't been dressed like that I guess he'd 'a been dead before the farmer found him."

The shoe merchant was still obsessed with the subject of boots, though his thoughts now took a philosophical turn. "I guess it's a good thing a man can't see the way things are goin' to turn out," he reflected. "Who'd thought when I sold John those boots, I'd see him die in 'em?"

"And buried in 'em, too." Eddie Patt spat at the stove. "S'pose there'll be a funeral?"

"The town'll have to bury him," said Dick Cary. "Uncle Charlie 'll see to that, I guess. He's the town doctor."

"Oh, he'll be buried all right, all right." Fred Green relinquished the boots, and returned to the stove. "But I don't know about a funeral. You didn't see any ministers prayin' over him this afternoon, did you?"

"No," said Dick Cary emphatically, for he didn't like ministers.

"No, and I guess nobody else did. I wouldn't 'a been surprised to see the priest, but I didn't look for any ministers. No, I guess the only sermon that'll be preached over John is what Jim Cooley'll say when he has to dig a grave in this kind of weather."

Over their heads a piano thumped, and male voices burst into song.

"That must be the openin' chorus for the minstrels," said Fred Green, and he cocked an ear at the sound. "Yup. It is. I heard 'em singin' it at the last rehearsal. It goes somethin' like this—

"Fire! Fire! Fire!
The people cry and shout;
Fire! Fire! Fire!
Oh, who will put it out?"

Eddie Patt found something amusing and appropriate in the words. "That's what old John 'll be askin' before long. Who'll put the fire out?"

"It's goin' to be a darned good show this year," said Fred Green. "Say! If there's anybody funnier'n Bottle Case I'd like to know who it is. Bert Roberts is a pretty good end-man, but Bottle's got some jokes worked up that're as funny's anything I ever heard."

"Bottle's a card, all right," agreed Eddie Patt.

"Well, I'll put Bottle up against Lew Dockstader anytime——"

"He cert'nly c'n tell a story. Ever heard him tell the one about the hired man and the calf?"

"Yeh!" Fred Green cackled and slapped his knee.

They sat listening to the song and movement above their heads. In a moment of stillness Eddie Patt yawned again.

"Yah! Say, if I'm goin' to stick around, Fred, I got to have another nip——"

And then, it seemed, they were all aware at once that Gooseline's John had gone. Like the tick of an accustomed clock, they had not missed his labored breathing until some time after it had ceased. They rose simultaneously and approached the cot. Dick Cary moved gingerly along the narrow space between the cot and the cells and, still gingerly, felt for the pulse.

"Yeah?" whispered Fred Green.

Dick Cary nodded. Then he pulled the gray blanket higher, and retired.

A thoughtful mood settled upon the three watchers. Gooseline's John had gone while they talked, while they listened to the minstrel music of the village firemen; and in his secret going they seemed to feel a rebuke. It was as if, scorning their presence, he had deliberately cheated them of the moment for which they waited; the only moment of his life which remained to tease their curiosity.

The piano thumped again, and again the chorus of vigorous male voices seeped down to them, carrying the muffled words of a popular coon song of the day—

My gal's a high-born lady,
She's dark but not too shady;
Feathered like a peacock,
Just as gay—

"They ought to shut up," muttered Fred Green.

They stood, immobile, while the song went through to its hearty climax—

'Long the line they can't outshine
This high-born gal o' mi-i-ine.

In the intensified silence that followed, Dick Cary heard Fred Green saying hesitantly: "I don't s'pose there's anything more we can do now——"

"We ought to hunt up Uncle Charlie," said Dick.

"That's right!" Fred Green seemed to welcome the suggestion. "We ought to hunt up the doc——"

Still he lingered at the foot of the cot, over the protruding felt boots. Then he did something that Dick Cary was never to forget; it was to be the most significant funeral rite he would ever witness. Fred Green took from his pocket the bottle that he and Eddie Patt had been intermittently nipping. He held it to the light, seemed to measure its contents, and put it to his lips with a gesture toward Gooseline's John.

"Here's to you, John," he said simply.

He swallowed, and passed the bottle to Eddie Patt.

"Here's to you, John," echoed Eddie.

Fred Green tip-toed past the cot and gently opened the transom window.

"There might be somethin' in here that wants to get out," he said. He was a little shame-faced, but entirely earnest. "You can't tell——"

"Jesus!" gasped Eddie Patt, looking more than ever like a startled rabbit.

Dick Cary shivered. The moment for which he had waited with professional curiosity found him stripped of his professional detachment. The great mystery was manifest here, even to the buck-toothed Eddie Patt. It seemed as if something was with them in the narrow corridor, outside the vision of their eyes; and they left its presence, awed, and afraid.

IV

Dick Cary was driven home by his hero that night; and as the cutter slid noiselessly over the hard-packed road he was led to speak of the behavior of his companions and himself.

"They did that, did they? That's what they did, eh?" Dr. Stanley chuckled. "Well, that's human nature. That's the way folks behave. It takes death to make 'em stop their cackling."

The doctor halted his horse in front of Dick Cary's house.

"I've got a lot of respect for death, boy," he said. "There's something noble about death."

CLINICAL NOTES

BY GEORGE JEAN NATHAN

Persuading the American.—Professors of the native popular psychology have long recognized the fact that the American is seldom to be persuaded of a given thing directly, and that, if he is to be won over to one or another point of view, the job must be done in an oblique manner. A glance at several recent popular American convictions substantiates the verity of the professors' findings. Prohibition was sold to the American people not by telling them plainly and directly that alcoholic liquor was bad for them, which they would have resented as an insult to their own powers of self-control, but by telling them discreetly and flatteringly that it was bad for persons who had no self-control. The late war was sold not by telling the people that Germany was an enemy but by telling them that France was a friend. Coolidge sold himself not by talking common-sense but by refraining from talking nonsense. Nine-tenths of the Americans who presently believe in evolution do not believe in it because they have been told it is a scientific fact, but simply because they have been made to laugh at its funny-looking opponents.

The Frenchman and the Bath.—One of the immemorial pieces of jocosity among Anglo-Saxons, its foundation rooted more or less in fact, concerns the anatomical hydrophobia of the French. That the Frenchman substitutes a pinch of talcum for the tub and that the Saturday night bath joke has no point in France save one specify, in addition, the month and year, have been among the standard articles in the credo of the northern countries for a century or more. Recent developments, however, indicate that a change is dawning and that it will not be many years longer before the bathtub is at least as familiar to Frenchmen as it is to West Virginians.

Mr. George Cecil, a special investigator employed by the American Druggist, recently made a tour of France to ascertain, through soap sales, just how far the grievous situation had turned for the better. He discovered that the sale of soap among Frenchmen showed a remarkable increase since the conclusion of the late war. But, though his report was highly interesting in a statistical direction, one or two points that have an illuminating bearing upon the situation appear to have eluded him.

Although the fact has not thus far been made public, I am reliably informed that the popularization of soap among the French has been due in no small measure to the activity and ingenuity of the nation's Ministry of Fine Arts. Mr. Cecil, in his report, has duly noted the new ways in which soap in France is put up, and, also, the new names and fragrances that have been imparted to it, but he has missed drawing the important conclusion between cause and effect. For many, many years, the cheaper grades of soap made in France and designed for home consumption—as opposed to the fancier and tonier soaps designed for export—were unattractively packed, unattractively labeled and but mildly scented. There was nothing about them, in a word, to inflame the fancy of the Frenchman and persuade him to them. The export soaps with their gaudier aspects were too expensive for him and, besides, were seldom displayed in the French shops. What he saw therein, if he so much as looked at them, were soaps so unalluring and homely that they revolted him. This fact the Ministry of Fine Arts took cognizance of a few years ago, and promptly took steps to correct. True enough, the department went at the business of improving the national condition in an indirect and sotto voce manner, but at it it went none the less.

The first move it made was to get the manufacturers of soap for the home trade to abandon the plain and unattractive wrappers of the past and to hire skilful color artists to design wrappers and cartons that would engage and enchant the impressionable French eye. In a short time, accordingly, no less than sixty-five brands of cheap soaps that had erstwhile appeared in plain, lettered, paper wrappers, came out with coverings emblazoned with all the tints and hues of the spectrum and, to boot, with eye-popping chromos of lovely hussies in the altogether, young widows being chased down the boulevards by Senators in top hats, satyrs taking advantage of moonlit nights, midinettes standing on iron-grillings with the wind blowing their petticoats heavenward, and other such inspiriting spectacles. In a short time, too, the long-standing and unromantic labels, most of them consisting simply of the manufacturers' names, disappeared and in their places were duly beheld such provocative designations as "Lovers' Kiss," "Perfect Love," "Nuit d'Amour," "Don Juan's Delight," etc. And with these changes, there came a change as well in the perfuming of the soaps, for where formerly they were not much more nostril-massaging than nigger gin, they now began to give out the smells of musk, tube-roses and similarly puissant fauna and flora. The change worked like magic. The French, until now almost as hostile to soap as to the Hun, found themselves attracted to it as they had never before been. And, as Mr. Cecil has reported, sales began to mount steadily. The circus colors, the exciting pictures, the pretty names and the irresistible empyreumas had turned the trick. And another feather went into the cap of French diplomacy.

The Decline of the Short Story.—That the American novel has advanced out of all proportion to the American short story in the last fifteen years is pretty well agreed upon. Just why the shorter form of fiction has been left far behind in the matter of relative quality has been puzzling the diagnosticians. Many reasons have been offered, some of them convincing. But one reason, more convincing than the rest, I believe, has been overlooked. And that reason is to be found in the illustrated magazines.

It is, of course, a platitude that fiction is critically estimable in the degree that it creates authentic character. While our better novelists have duly concerned themselves with this requisite of their art, our short story writers have not. Few novelists worth considering look to the magazines for revenue from the sale of their work. The magazines, illustrated or not, use very few novels, or serial stories. For one novel, they use seventy-five or a hundred short stories. The magazines are thus a direct market, and a very good one, for the short story writers, who rely almost entirely upon the proceeds therefrom for their livelihood. There is little money in most books made up of short stories, whereas there is considerable in novels. The novelist may thus trust to his book sales for his income, but the short story writer may not. Not being able to, the latter must write with the magazines in mind rather than the book publisher, and he must turn out a great deal more work. But this is not the point. The point, rather, is that, having to turn out a relatively large number of short stories to make a living, he soon grows careless in the fabrication of characters that shall be vivid to the reader and lazily leaves the job to the magazine illustrators. He allows the pictures to do what he doesn't do. He relies upon the illustrations to give his readers an idea of his characters and confines himself more and more to plot, action and the general externals of fiction. He knows from experience that the editors of the illustrated magazines, which are the big-paying ones, do not care for character analysis, "descriptions," etc., that they rely, instead, upon lithographs quickly to suggest such things to the impatient reader, and gradually he falls into the habit of omitting them. Many promising short story writers have thus gone down the chute. It would be easy, were one given to impoliteness, to name names. It is not, as is sometimes argued, that these writers have been ruined by writing short stories to order—as a matter of fact, short stories are seldom written to order, as editors are not such fools as to buy fiction in advance of reading it—; it is simply that the writers have ruined themselves by writing toward magazine illustrations instead of away from them. With a single exception, there is not a first-rate writer of short stories in America today whose work has appeared regularly in the illustrated periodicals. I believe that there is considerable significance in the fact.

Romance and America.—The pathetic lack of and longing for romantic glamor in the United States in these years of the Twentieth Century are clearly impressed upon us in the circumstances attending the death, not long ago, of the moving picture actor, Valentino. Laugh at the spectacle as one may, the fact remains that Valentino was the one figure who had succeeded in capturing the romantic fancy of American women since the day of Richmond Pearson Hobson, twenty-five years before. For a quarter of a century, that is, there was no man to bounce the imagination of the bulk of American females and to present himself to them in the light of a resplendent hero and lover. To the majority of men, of course, there was approximately as much romantic glamor to Valentino as there is to a plate of ravioli, and as for Hobson, for all his greater engagement with masculine adventure, there was not so very much more. But, to women condemned to lives in the company of mesh underwear manufacturers, stock salesmen and shirt clerks, there was a great deal, and reasonably. For Valentino and Hobson had about them that thing which beguiles the fancy of women, and which their American husbands and beaux lack, to wit—and for want of a better phrase—romantic insolence. That the one was a mere film posturer and the other simply a play-actor without grease-paint only goes to demonstrate more fully the poverty in native materials of glamor and romance.

Valentino and Hobson are merely the symbols of a greater and more important deficiency in American color and the craving therefor. In no other country in the world is the national palette so lacking in hues. Abroad, the proletariat has its kings, queens, princes, dictators and generals dressed up like circus horses to inflame and enchant its fancy. The American has only a President in a business suit and a Vice-President who chews tobacco. Abroad, the commoners have their legendary Joans of Arc and their Cids to keep alive the spirit of their flower-day fêtes. The American has only, in comparison, his Barbara Frietchie, forgotten with the school-room poem, and Admiral Dewey, who shouldn't have put that house in his wife's name. Yet how pathetically the poor American strives for the superficial glamor that doesn't exist! He engaulds himself with Mystic Shriner regalia in the attempt to delude himself that he is a gallant crusader to the Holy Land. He adorns his derby hat with ostrich plumes and straps a tin sword to his side by way of making himself believe that he is a knight out of heroic times. He makes a hero out of a politician who got on a horse with hundreds of guns behind him, rode up a hill about as high as the grave of an Exalted Mogul of the Moose and chased a dozen starving Spaniards down the other side. He declares a half holiday and yells himself hoarse in patriotic excitement when a German girl and a Danish woman, astutely carrying American flags, come home after swimming the English Channel. Let those American men who snicker at foolish women for making a hero out of the good-looking Italian Valentino reserve a snicker equally as robust for that considerable portion of their own foolish sex which, a few years before, made a hero out of a good-looking Frenchman on the theory that he was a champion prize-fighter.

The Overwhelming Genius of Literary America, III.—1. "Thornton Niven Wilder, author of 'The Cabala,' who is only 29, comes before the world with a style distinguished by maturity and by an exquisite sense of tonal values, subdued to a perfect and supple instrument of literary expression. He uses words with the professional sense of color and numerical weight of a gambler dealing a faro bank. His style bears comparison with Pater. . . . It suggests one of those wonderful clocks made by medieval craftsmen which, when other timepieces merely strike twelve, keep track of sidereal and ecclesiastical time, mark the phases of the moon with meticulous accuracy. . . ."—New York Times Book Review.

Pathology and Nature.—The war between pathology and nature is vicious and endless, with nature thus far triumphantly astride pathology's stomach and booting it simultaneously in the rear. Pathology arrives as an analysis of and cure for tuberculosis, and nature devises cancer. Pathology gets the better of syphilis, and nature comes back with acute trigeminal neuralgia. Pathology whips smallpox, and nature counters with a valvular heart. Pathology masters the mystery of diabetes insipidus, and nature puts a tack on pathology's chair in the form of the seven years' itch. Pathology wallops the rabies, and nature sidles in with leprosy. Pathology beats typhoid, and nature chalks up Asiatic cholera. Pathology solves beri-beri, and nature invents Pott's disease. Pathology triumphs over bronchopneumonia, pleurisy, gall-stones, mastoiditis, salpingitis, asthma, peritonitis, puerperal hemorrhage and worms, and nature chuckles with locomotor ataxia, epilepsy, aortic insufficiency, chronic endocarditis, apoplexy, paralysis, cerebrospinal meningitis, epithelioma of the liver, exophthalmic goiter, chronic morphinism and baldness.

THE THEATRE

BY GEORGE JEAN NATHAN

YOU cannot convert a bottle of ginger pop into one of vintage wine simply by pasting a champagne label on it, nor can you, in turn, convert a romantic musical show into a native opera by attaching that designation to it. This is what the Messrs. Hopkins, Harling and Stallings tried to do in the case of "Deep River." If "Deep River" is an opera, native or otherwise, "Die Götterdämmerung" is a drawing-room comedy. What "Deep River" is is merely a libretto with operatic leanings that remains unsupported by a musician. There are melodic interruptions; there is a choral interpretation of one portion of the exhibit; and there are orchestras on the stage and in the pit. But one finds these, as well, in many musical comedies, as one finds also librettos with operatic leanings. "Song of the Flame," for example, with a few slashes at its minor comedy elements, offers no less an operatic book than that which Mr. Stallings has here contributed. And so with "The Waltz Dream." And so with "Countess Maritza." The Stallings libretto, do not mistake me, has its merits; it catches some of the mauve and golden tremors of Louisiana in its day of Creole glory; but it never quite catches the basso profundo passion of opera drammatica. Its emotional content is rather the mezzo soprano of operetta. Its duels and deaths and murders are contrived in the quiet manner of Clare Kummer, and Mr. Hopkins' staging has emphasized that manner doubly. The entire presentation has been directed in the calm and unruffled fashion of such a comedy as "A Successful Calamity" or "Good Gracious Annabelle." Even the second act, made up of a mad voodoo ceremony, has been produced without any more physical movement than a John Drew parlor piece; when the jazz rhythms occupy the orchestra and singers, the stage remains completely static. Neither lyrics nor melodies are dramatized.

As for the Harling contribution, there is not much to say. The ghost of Puccini unmistakably sat with the gentleman during the period of his accouchement. Where he has not laid hold of traditional and recognizable native themes and strains, and legitimately enough, he has gone for inspiration to the candy-shop presided over by the confectioner of "Butterfly," "Fanciulla del West" and "Bohème." His jazz itself is not authentic; it is a mere syncopation of alien melodies. It is not native—if I may be allowed the adjective; it is more in line with the species of thing that one hears in England and on the Continent when foreign music-mechanics, attempting the American negro rhythms, simply take a local popular tune and syncopate it. A measure of Harling's jazz is no more American than a jazz version of "Valencia" is Spanish.

On this question of jazz rhythms applied to opera, objection has been raised by certain critical voices. It has been maintained that it is at once anachronistic and absurd to interpret the spirit of the Louisiana of the 1830's in terms of relatively modern jazz. Such criticism is purely academic and technically idiotic. It might be argued analogously that it is at once equally anachronistic and absurd to interpret the spirit of the court of Herod 1830-odd years earlier in terms of Richard Strauss' Twentieth Century orchestral innovations. Criticism of this kind is worse than superficial; it gives a monkey-show at the expense of intelligence. The true objection to an association of jazz and opera goes considerably deeper. Jazz is a too cheap and shallow musical medium to evoke, convey and further any save cheap and shallow emotions. The passions of love and hate, of exaltation and profound grief can no more be interpreted by jazz than they can be interpreted by a water-whistle. Jazz is an artificial musical stimulant, designed primarily for dancers, boozers and men with the emotional equipment of chorus girls. It is to music what a ball-room floor is to the bed-rock of the building itself. No more can an opera—an opera in anything but name—be fashioned out of it than a battle song can be made out of a music show moon tune. There was hint, at least, of rapture in the quadroon Louisiana of "Deep River"; all that Harling's jazz made of it was a casual liaison between a Harlem saxophone player and a hoover wench at the Cotton Club.

II

While the drama may be many miles ahead of Jim Tully, I doubt that the theatre has yet caught up to him. He is too cruel, too forthright and too raw for an institution that, for all its progress, is yet in many of its phases, by virtue of its democratic nature, still an ante-chamber to the kindergarten. Tully goes down into the sewers of American life for his fiction and dramatic materials, and out of those sewers he fetches forth characters dripping somewhat too odoriferously for the pleasure of the native æsthetic tenderfoot. When his "Beggars of Life," as fine a book of its kind as has been written in our day, was lifted over onto the stage, it was found necessary, after the initial performance, to doctor up the element of incest that the weak stomachs of theatre audiences might not gag at it. The novel "Jarnegan" contains stuff that has outraged many; certain of its phrases would make Petronius himself rush for the smelling salts. And now we find, in "Black Boy," still further indications that the last thing in the world that the stage can do is to hold the mirror up to nature and get away with it.

This "Black Boy" is, in its technical phases, a play as crudely wrought as is "Jarnegan" a novel. Tully misses all sense of form; he has no more finish, in the accepted sense of the word, than a medicine show; he grabs all the blinding scarlets of the palette in his fist and, with one smash, smears them flat against the wall, from which they proceed to drip in ugly splotches. As I say, form is lacking, but if there is a writer in America today who can lay hold of mean people and mean lives and tear their mean hearts out with more appalling realism, his work is unknown to me. This Tully is the Weyer in modern American literature. Even his casual journalistic interviews, the best interviews that you will find in the present public prints, have the flavor of the king's utterances in scene 2 of the third act of "Richard II." The simplest chronicle of a movie queen's rise to eminence is not complete for Tully save it include an account of the way her illegitimate Hungarian uncle bit off her mother's ear in a fit of delirium tremens, of the attempt made by the vice-presidents of the six largest moving picture companies to lure her into white slavery on behalf of the presidents, of the three or four directors who were mysteriously shot by other directors for trying to force their wicked wills upon her, of incredible machinations on the part of Jewish purveyors of Swedish bathing beauties to destroy her prestige by spreading innuendoes concerning her and a San Francisco Chinaman, and of the manner in which the proud beauty was cured of an Oriental disease only after years of mixing mercury with her gin. His stories of hoboes, yeggs, harlots, jail-birds, niggers, of all the riff-raff of humanity, crawl among the vermin in the cellar beneath the cellar of Gorki's "Night Refuge." Their lusts and oaths and miserable bravery sound in a bar-room bacchanale. For when Tully approaches a character, he approaches that character's soul only after he has first ripped off the last shred of his undershirt, torn off his trousers and given him a contemptuously critical boot in the rear. The fellow has about as much delicacy as an iron-riveter. But, when his job is finished, no one can say that he hasn't got the smashing effect that he has gone after. And what is more—and this is the important point—that he hasn't got that effect legitimately. He is often cheaply melodramatic; he is sometimes so loud that he is unintelligible; but, when the roar of battle has died down, he has got his man.

"Black Boy," as it comes to us in the theatre with the name of Frank Dazey, author of the gimcrack, "Peter Weston," significantly added to Tully's on the play-bill, is surely not the play that Tully originally wrote. The play that Tully wrote, if I am any judge of him, estimating him from his antecedent work, certainly made no such compromises with an audience's tender feelings and prejudices. I point to a single example. The play tells the story of a humble Negro's dream of grandeur that lies in the title of heavy-weight champion of the world, in the attendant wealth and power and in the love of a white woman. And it tells then the story in gradual diminuendo of the toll of vainglory and dissipation and of the final vanishing of the last wisps of that dream in the discovery that, like all other illusions of this world, the white woman, whose arms hold in them the fellow's unreal Heaven, is only a high yaller. Or, at any rate, that was the story, unless I am in error, that Tully's play once told. But when that play came traveling into the timid theatre, things happened to it. An audience would resent the spectacle of a big Negro—and the rôle was to be played by an actual Negro—indulging in amorous contacts with a white woman, or one who it was persuaded to believe was white. Did not, forsooth, such resentment show itself when the theme of O'Neill's "All God's Chillun" was announced? It would be unwise to take chances. And so the script was duly altered to include two "plants" assuring the audience in the earlier portions of the play that the woman, for all her appearance, had colored blood. Obviously, the whole point of the play was thus got rid of at one swoop, and the eventual disillusionment of the central character deleted of all dramatic force. A number of other such changes are as clearly evident, all contributing to a weakening of Tully's original. Yet, weakened or not, and with all its crudity, this "Black Boy" is yet a living, breathing thing. It has more vitality, more kinship with actuality and more reality of character than nine-tenths of the artfully tailored plays we get in a round of a theatrical year.

Paul Robeson, out of the cast of the O'Neill play alluded to, though he permitted himself an occasional concert platform manner, brought a picturesque performance to the leading rôle. In the rôle of the high yellow inamorata, a girl named Freddy Washington, drafted out of a colored cabaret, was, despite the fact that she couldn't act at all, enormously effective. Although there is, of course, considerable buncombe in the so-called playing one's self idea, this was one occasion when the theory worked beautifully.

III

Bourdet's "La Prisonnière," or "The Captive" in its local baptism, impresses me as being the most finely wrought drama of sex that has come out of France since Porto-Riche's "Amoureuse." Surely no other French drama dealing with the alarms and excursions of biology and produced in the interval has been so understandingly fashioned, so penetrating in detail, so profoundly moving in its intelligent emotionalism or so ably and searchingly manœuvered. The thing has a veritable majesty; it moves upward on its course with something of the splendor of tragedy of old. Every touch and phase of character and action are polished with a convincing sympathy and a complete, round grasp. Not the slightest compromise mars the drama's contour; the author has made of his materials a play that encompasses them with an unimpeachable honesty.

The theme is doubtless familiar enough from its cabled rehearsal from the Continent and from its chronicle in the American prints—the story of a young woman tortured by perverted inclinations and of her vain and tragic fight to master them. Plainly enough, such a theme has not been entirely to the taste of a certain arm of local criticism and the admirable drama has been confronted in various quarters with the time-honored species of appraisal that confuses morals and art. The very gentlemen who are content to regard "Cedipus Rex," for all its perversion, as drama pure and simple, have been indisposed to grant the Bourdet work a like generous consideration. Time hallows the sins of drama, it would seem, as it hallows the adjective unpleasant. Even the lowest dolt practising criticism would hesitate to dub as unpleasant the "Ecclesiastusæ," though the venerated papas do not hesitate still to bestow the adjective on "Ghosts," "Erdgeist," "The God of Vengeance" and "La Prisonnière." To expect a dramatist to take an unpleasant subject and by some esoteric magic make it pleasant is to demand of him that he be a charlatan. That job is not for artists, but for quacks. Bourdet has laid hold of a Lesbian and has told her story forthrightly and without reservations. There is no vestige of sensationalism, no trace of theatrical exploitation, however. He proceeds with dignity, with meditation, and with an uncommon comprehension. A dozen episodes show not only an able dramatist at work, but an able and experienced mind as well. The anatomy of love and physical passion has seldom been so piercingly approached in the drama of the present day. The scene between the errant girl's husband and the husband of her temptress, the second scene between the husband and his former mistress, the final scene of confrontation between the girl and the man she has married in an attempt to cure herself of her sexual aberration, the scene of the girl's early alarms over the way that she seems destined to go—these constitute the stuff of first-rate drama.

Bourdet's particular virtue lies in the fact that never once during the progress of the drama is he guilty of the sin of pleading. He throws his materials, adeptly fashioned, upon the stage and permits them calmly to tell their tale. There is no hint of propaganda, of lecturing, of pointing a moral. It is easy to surmise what such a fellow countryman as Brioux, say, would have done with the same materials. Act II would not have gone half its distance before the leading male character would have stepped to the footlights and, as in the case of Cosmo Hamilton's "Danger"—a play on the same subject—delivered a statistical speech descanting upon the woe that threatened the world if such conditions were permitted to go on. Bourdet, to the contrary, is no more personal or indignant over his theme than the author of "Abie's Irish Rose." His one concern has been to write sound drama, and he has duly written it.

The Miller production, direction and acting of the play are extraordinarily good.

IV

It is a convention of criticism that melodrama, even at its best, is somehow peculiarly one of the dramatic sub-arts and that it must accordingly be treated with proper condescension. If this is true, the reason for its truth eludes me. The only way in which I can figure out the senseless prejudice is to recall the persistent custom of affixing definite labels to everything and, once they are duly affixed, of basing criticism upon the labels instead of upon what is in the bottles. The word melodrama has fallen into disrepute simply because the English critics, abandoning its exact meaning, began carelessly to employ it some forty-odd years ago to designate any play that they liked but felt they shouldn't like. Today, the word is never used with literal accuracy, but is used indiscriminately to describe any theatrical exhibit that doesn't fall with a ready click into one or another of the standard pigeon-holes. A drama in which a revolver is fired thus automatically becomes a melodrama. So does a genre study in which one of the characters steals money, is caught in the act by a policeman and avoids arrest by jumping out of the first-floor window and breaking the pane. So does a comedy that contains a safe hidden in the wall. So does a tragedy in which a railroad express train is even casually mentioned. The monkeyshines performed with the label are endless.

The detractors of melodrama—still using the word as it is currently employed—apparently never stop to think that their derogatory designation fits many of the classics quite as closely as it fits the modern plays upon which they slap it. If a melodrama is a play in which action is more important than character, in which a character is influenced from without rather than from within, and in which emotions are played fortissimo, then "Electra" and "Seven Before Thebes" are melodramas. If a melodrama is a play in which lust, murder, revenge and physical action predominate, then "Macbeth" and "Hamlet" are melodramas. If a melodrama is a play in which a man bent upon evil disguises himself, enters a house, commits a murder, is confronted by a woman with an axe, jumps at her with his bloody sword and, upon her running away from him, chases her around until he catches up with her and runs her through the gizzard, then the "Choephoreæ" of Aeschylus is a melodrama. If a melodrama is a play in which a woman of criminal impulses meditates a Grand Guignol revenge and slowly puts it into execution, then the "Medea" of Euripides is a melodrama. And if a melodrama is a play in which high emotion dominates and controls rational thought, then the "Antigone" of Sophocles is ten times the melodrama that "Sherlock Holmes" is.

The play called "Broadway," by the Messrs. Dunning and Abbott, while uniformly hailed for its interest, has not avoided the stigma of the old melodramatic sticker. As a matter of fact, though it contains certain of the external elements of melodrama, this "Broadway" is actually no more melodramatic in essence than such a play as "The Show-Off" or "The County Chairman." The confusion is brought about by confounding the intrinsic melodramatic nature of its characters and scene with the treatment the authors have accorded them. What "Broadway" is is rather a sharply photographic study of that portion of New York's sewer-life that swirls around the bootlegging night clubs set into a frame of broad but observantly puncturing humor. Not since Helen Green's memorable transcriptions of Broadway fauna and Broadway lingo have we had a more honestly amusing picture of Rialto rats than this play provides. To my mind, it contributes the most faithful, pitiable and laughable document on its subject matter that either American literature or the American stage has thus far given us. It has a deceptively cheap air that throws the unthinking critic off his guard until he stops short and remembers that the cheapness is intrinsic to the dramatic materials, and at once completely relevant, natural and necessary. It has, too, an air of loudness and flashiness that contrives to dismay the fastidious critic until again he ponders its thorough integrity. The characterizations are, every one of them, excellent. The slight exaggeration for dramatic purposes has been accomplished so dexterously that one can barely detect it. The cabaret dancing girl, the cocky hoofer, the bootleggers, the wop restaurant proprietor, the gunmen—they are all of them as real, in look, speech, thought and conduct, as dramatic art laying its hands upon life can make them. These are no mere melodrama puppets, for all their revolvers and oaths and what not, but authentic portraits. And here, once again, we have production, direction and acting that get the last drop of juice out of the manuscript.

Into the dramatization of Dreiser's "An American Tragedy," Patrick Kearney has got everything but the novel's importance. He has managed with considerable theatrical skill to compress the four pounds of literature within the relatively meagre space of the proscenium arch; he has lifted the characters adroitly from the printed text onto the stage; he has been strictly obedient to that text and refrained from more than a trivial interpolation or two of his own; he has allowed the story to unfold itself quite as Dreiser allowed it to. Yet all that his play comes to is an orthodox melodrama relieved but intermittently by little flashes of the quality that make the novel what it is. The bare bones are there, but the cloak of understanding, meticulous detail and ploughing, earth-upturning pity and sympathy with which Dreiser covered them is missing.

It is a practise of criticism to observe that the canvas of the stage is too small upon which to duplicate the tones and colors and crowded occurrences of a novel so encompassingly bulky as this one. One hears the plaint when any novel of unusual length is turned into a play, when Thackeray, Dostoevski or even David Graham Phillips is set within the frame of the theatre. The job, on such occasions, is surely not an easy one, but I doubt, nonetheless, that the critical viewpoint is sound. The difficulty lies not with the canvas of the stage but with the dramatizer of the novel. He keeps the reader of the novel forever in his consciousness and addresses himself to that reader instead of to the auditor. Fearful of offending the reader, already familiar with the materials, by leaving out of the play any number of things that are wholly unessential to a dramatic interpretation of the novel, he produces a hybrid that is neither novel nor drama. The stage is amply capable of harboring the dramatization of any novel, however hefty, but it is not capable of harboring an unwieldy novel made into a play that aims to satisfy, at one clip, a spectator who is at once half-reader and half-auditor. In this way, Kearney's stage version of the Dreiser book fails of its purpose. It attempts to jounce the theatre auditorium and synchronously to placate the library.

Where the playwright has kept the spectator uppermost in his mind and has carefully remembered that he is a dramatist named Kearney and not a novelist named Dreiser, his stage work gets its effects nicely as, for example, in the scene in Roberta Alden's room and in the scene outside of and inside Doctor Glenn's house. But on many more occasions one feels the novel squirming uneasily and self-consciously in its grease-paint. It is not that Kearney has not preserved the integrity of the characters, for he has. It is not, further, the fault of the performers, for Morgan Farley, Katherine Wilson and Miriam Hopkins are excellent as Clyde, Roberta and Sondra. It is simply that the playwright is obviously nervous in the novel's presence and solicitous over the drama's encroachment upon it. He gives one the feeling of being afraid of being momentarily called down by the novelist and patting him conciliatingly on the back.

Dreiser's "American Tragedy" is a tale sounded by a hippodrome orchestra. A hundred fiddlers, a hundred trombone players and a hundred drummers perform its emotions. Kearney's "American Tragedy" plays the same melody, but on a piano and with one finger. The motif is there, but it is relatively faint. Dreiser took a more or less obvious murder melodrama and made it literature; Kearney has taken it and merely left it a more or less obvious murder melodrama.

Wells Redivivus

THE WORLD OF WILLIAM CLISSOLD: a Novel at a New Angle, by H. G. Wells. $5. 7½ x 5½; 2 vols.; 797 pp. New York: The George H. Doran Company.

LONG ago, as time runs in literary science—to wit, in December, 1918—I printed a melancholy article upon the engulfing of H. G. Wells the novelist by H. G. Wells the publicist and seer. The former, I argued, was a charming fellow, full of spicy observation and waggish reflection; the latter was only a bore. The title of that article was "The Late Mr. Wells," and it was later reprinted in a book. All I can say now, re-reading it in the light of "The World of William Clissold," is that it seems to have been a bit premature, not to say injudicious. For I overlooked completely the probable effect of the fats, carbohydrates and proteids of Wells the novelist upon the metabolism of the cannibalistic Wells the seer. I assumed that the latter, as in "The Future in America" and "God the Invisible King," would go on being a bore.

This assumption, as connoisseurs will recall, was given a severe blow in 1920, by the publication of "An Outline of History." It is now completely blown up by "The World of William Clissold." In this book the novelist and the seer finish their process of mutual digestion. They become one and indivisible, as a Christian and a holy wafer become one and indivisible. And they become, likewise, extraordinarily meritorious. It is not only a good book; it is an amazing book, and I confess that I have read it from cover to cover with eager and constantly rising interest. There are, to be sure, weak spots in it, as there are in Holy Writ, but taken as a whole it is unquestion-ably a sound and brilliant performance. I can imagine no other English novelist writing anything comparable to it, and no American of any sort. It is at once the confession and the defiance of one of the most remarkable men of our time. Summing up at sixty, he puts the world as he has seen it in its place.

In a longish preface, printed before the title-page, Wells protests somewhat violently against the common critical error of confusing him as an individual with the characters in his books, and in the pages that follow he is at pains to make this distinction clear, sometimes by the naïve device of having Clissold discuss and attack the known ideas of Wells. His sensitiveness on the point, I suspect, has its rise in the notorious tendency of certain literary gossips to concern themselves with his private affairs, and especially with his affairs of amour. He is credited by these gossips with a great enterprise in that department, and no doubt they will seek, as usual, to identify the prototypes of the ladies loved by William Clissold. But that inquiry need not concern us here. As he says himself, a novelist, in the last analysis, must always dredge most of his material out of his own experience: he needs imagination, obviously, but it is useless without observation.

If Wells, in his journey through this world, has ever actually had dealings with such women as Sirrie Evans, the Helen whose surname I disremember, and Clementina Campbell, then I can only offer him my respectful felicitations. For they must have been extremely amusing and instructive gals, and out of his conferences with them has come a series of character studies of the first rank. There is little of dull normalcy in Sirrie, Helen and Clementina. They are all, as the Victorians used to say, handsful. They fetch Clissold by their striking and often abominable strangeness. But Wells somehow reduces them to the natural order of femininity. They become laboratory animals in an elaborate and immensely illuminating investigation of the ways of their sex. It is not, however, their specially sexual character that is under scrutiny. There is little of sex, indeed, in the ordinary sense, in the book: Clissold is a psychologist rather than a lover, though he once describes himself grandly as a rake. The lights are always upon their ways and means as persons, individuals, units of human society. I can recall no more penetrating discussion of sex in general, nor of its social implications, including marriage.

The book, thank God, has no plot: Clissold simply lives and dies. Nor is there any visible hortatory purpose in it, despite its constant concern with grave matters of social organization, statecraft, education, morals, and human destiny. Clissold is the intelligent modern of Wells' old adoration—the fellow who has had a sound grounding in exact knowledge, but has branched out into the regions of speculation. The type is admirable, and essentially new in the world. The Greeks, for all their intellectual adventurousness, never produced it, nor even, indeed, came to any suspicion that it could exist. They tried to formulate history without statistics, science without experiment, and ethics without psychology. The modern man is something quite different. If he lacks the daring of the Greeks, then he at least has vastly more information. No college professor of today is so stupid that he doesn't know more than Aristotle. No school-boy can read even Thucydides without occasionally coughing behind his hand. This increase of sheer enlightenment, in Wells' view, is gradually producing a type of man who is at once a philosopher and a man of the world—a sort of super-Goethe, purged of romantic illusion, and capable of visioning progress over long periods and against all imaginable obstacles, even the obstacle of human imbecility.

Wells himself is obviously a shining example of that type, or, at all events, of its forerunner. He is thoroughly the modern man. Certain vestiges of Victorian sentimentality, to be sure, are still in him. There are moments when his concept of progress becomes merely metaphysical, mystical, maudlin. He glimpses tantalizing visions of a perfected humanity that is scarcely to be distinguished from the pre-Darwinian God. But that is only now and then. In the main he sticks to facts—and his store of them is so immensely greater than that of any other contemporary novelist that he stands in a class all his own. Having imagined something, he is able to prove it. The proving, as I long ago contended, sometimes hobbles him as artist—but an artist pure and simple could not have written such a book as "The World of William Clissold." We must be content to take the bitter with the sweet. In order to get the Wells of that extraordinary work, and of "The Outline of History," we must make some sacrifice of the Wells of "Mr. Polly" and "Tono-Bungay."

Taking the man as he stands, it must be manifest that he is one of the most remarkable personages in the England of today. There is a stimulating and abounding aliveness about him. He has his finger in a multitude of pies. His fancy is bold and original. He is the complete antithesis of the stolid, unimaginative, muddling Briton of tradition. It seems to me that his speculations, even when a touch of extravagance gets into them, have a solid value—that in the midst of his most daring imaginings he often comes very close to the ultimate truth. Read, in "The World of William Clissold," his chapter on sex. Read his several interpolated essays on money. Read what he has to say about government, marriage, education—especially education. There is here a profoundly enterprising, competent and original mind, and I believe that it will put its marks upon the thought of the next generation. I have, in my time, damned Wells as much as most. I formally damn him again. But I see no way for the human race to escape him.

The Effects of Alcohol.

ALCOHOL AND LONGEVITY, by Raymond Pearl.
$3.50. 8½ x 5¾; 273 pp. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

DR. PEARL is director of the Institute of Biological Research at the Johns Hopkins, editor of the Quarterly Review of Biology, and a scientist of the first eminence. I mention these facts sadly, thinking of the burdens they throw upon the syndics of the Anti-Saloon League and the Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals. For these worthy Christian men, with his book confronting them, face the dreadful task of proving that he is, like Senator Reed and President Nicholas Murray Butler, in the pay of the Whiskey Trust, and hence a trashy and dubious fellow. Their proofs, you may be sure, will be forthcoming. They will blossom in all the State editions of the American Issue, in all the Christian Advocates, and in all the other journals of Christian Moronia. They will be vomited forth to the tune of loud hosannas from a hundred thousand Methodist and Baptist pulpits. They will be bawled up and down the land by Upshaw, Hobson and the rest of the prehensile saints. But not many rational Americans, I am convinced, will give them any credit. Their sole effect will be to propagate the news, already generally bruited about, that the principal Prohibitionist windjammers, clerical and lay, are not only fools but also liars.

Their lying, though he remains scientifically aloof and never specifically mentions it, is really the main theme of Dr. Pearl's book. What he essays to demonstrate is that many of the common notions of the effects of alcohol upon the human organism, now widespread in the world as a result of the Prohibition propaganda, are quite without any basis in scientific fact. To that end he undertakes a highly complicated but none the less beautifully clear analysis of the mortality in a large group of typical American working men and their families—a group divided, like the rest of us, into the three classes of total abstainers, moderate drinkers and drunkards. He shows instantly that the death-rate among the drunkards is higher than that among the other two groups—a fact long supported by everyday human experience. But when he comes to a comparative examination of the teetotalers and the moderate drinkers he departs very widely from the current Christian teaching. What he discovers, in brief, is that the moderate drinkers, taking one with another, actually live longer than the teetotalers. To be sure, it is not much longer, but nevertheless it is clearly longer. His proofs are massive and overwhelming. It is impossible, at least to an ordinary man, to imagine refuting them without resorting to metaphysics. But the Methodist bishops and their allies do not need metaphysics. They will fall back upon their standard charge, that Dr. Pearl has been bought by the Whiskey Trust, and no doubt they will add, as usual, that a good part of the gold needed to buy him came from the Bolsheviki. Such is Christian controversy in this great free Republic.

Meanwhile, the enlightened reader will find his book extremely interesting and instructive reading. His analysis of the evidence before him causes him to resort more than once to mathematical formulæ, and his argument is interspersed with a multitude of statistical tables, many of them very formidable, but he somehow manages to keep that argument simple and clear. What he achieves, in fact, is a really remarkable feat of lucid exposition: it is meticulously scientific, but it is at the same time magnificently plain. More, he not only presents his own evidence: he also examines at length the evidence of all previous inquirers, whether of the dry camp, the wet camp, or the scientific No Man's Land between. In particular, he undertakes an elaborate and devastating analysis of the so-called experience of the insurance companies, and in his hands it quickly goes to pieces. Theoretically, as everyone knows, the insurance companies bar heavy drinkers altogether. But actually, he finds, a great many heavy drinkers sneak in. Thus the insurance returns do not show, as the Prohibitionists have long maintained, that teetotalers live longer than moderate drinkers; they simply show that teetotalers live longer than the mixed group of moderate drinkers and drunkards. The heavy death-rate among the drunkards pulls down the general death-rate for all drinkers, moderate and heavy, and this difference is set forth upon wall-cards and displayed in every school-house in the land. But, as Dr. Pearl shows, it is not only inaccurate, but downright nonsensical. Its effect is to propagate a lie: to wit, that moderate drinkers have shorter lives than teetotalers. The truth is the exact opposite: that moderate drinkers live longer. Not much longer, I add again, but still longer—long enough, at worst, for a few more drinks.

As I hint, there is bad news in all this for the Wesleyan brethren who now essay to run the United States, and they will undoubtedly undertake to refute it in their customary manner—that is, by indulging themselves in furious denunciations of Dr. Pearl. Unluckily for them it is highly improbable that their philippics will shake his equanimity, and I believe that it will be wholly impossible for them to dispose of his facts. As strange as it may seem, his book reports the first study ever made of the effects of alcohol upon a large group of actual human beings, representative of the general population. In the past all such investigations have been based upon indirect evidences. The biologists have experimented with the lower animals, and the Prohibitionists have contented themselves with theology and invective. But Pearl has turned to Homo sapiens. A fortunate chance threw a large mass of impeccable evidence into his hands, and he has spent years analyzing it. His conclusions are so overwhelmingly convincing that it is hard to imagine enlightened men challenging them. He presents them calmly, clearly, and without irrelevant moralizing. He is not trying to establish anything save the inescapable facts before him. But the net effect of those facts, once they soak in, will be to greatly advance the fatal illness of Prohibition.

Notables

WHO'S WHO IN AMERICA, edited by Albert Nelson Marquis. $8.50. 9 x 7; 2270 pp. Chicago: The A. N. Marquis Company.

THIS, the fourteenth edition of "Who's Who in America," comes out in a new format. The biographies are arranged in three columns instead of the familiar two, the page is increased in size from seven and a half by five and a half inches to nine by seven, and the number of pages is reduced by nearly a half. There is another innovation: in the case of notables who have achieved the reward of viable offspring, the Christian names of their children are given. One learns, with polite surprise, that Congressman Balderdash has four sons, Theodore R., G. Dewey, Winfield and Orestes. One learns with even more surprise that Mrs. Margaret Sanger, the birth controller, has two. Altogether, there are 26,915 names listed, 1558 more than in the last volume. Among them I note that of Rodolpho Alfonzo Raffaelo Pierre Filibert Guglielmi di Valentina d'Antonguolla, alias Valentino, lamentably deceased since the work went to press. But, as usual, many other notables are strangely missing. Where is Jack Dempsey? Where is John S. Sumner, the successor to Comstock? Where is Captain Hartley, of the Leviathan? Where is the Hon. Horace J. Donnelly, the Comstock of the Postoffice? Where is Roger N. Baldwin, of the American Civil Liberties Union? His wife is there, under her maiden name, but Roger himself is non est. Henry Ford is present to the extent of 31 lines, but not Edsel. Can it be that Edsel is under suspicion of Red leanings?

"Who's Who in America" seems to be very inhospitable to the brethren of that faculty. I can't find Alexander Berkman, or William Z. Foster, or Bill Haywood, or Ettor, or J. T. Rutherford, head of the International Bible Students' Association, and there is nothing about Max Eastman save a curt reference to the edition for 1916-17. Emma Goldman is also missing, and so is Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, and so is Freda Kirchwey, managing editor of the Nation, though her father is admitted. But there are other omissions that are even stranger. All sorts of provincial dramatic editors, bad poets and literary clergymen are given space, but there is none for Edward Sapir, the philologist and anthropologist, and none for Dr. Isaac Goldberg, and none for Dr. John C. French, of the Johns Hopkins, and none for Lewis Mumford, and none for Dr. Arthur J. Cramp, of the American Medical Association, or Lewis S. Gannett. Irita Van Doren is listed, but with the incredible statement that she was born in 1981. Will Rogers has got in at last, but Frank Craven is still missing. Fatty Arbuckle lingers as a three-line note, but there is no mention of Pauline Lord, or Anita Loos, or Katherine Cornell, or Marilyn Miller. I find the Talmadge girls, but not Doris Stevens. Tilden, the tennis player, is there, disguised as an "author," but I can't find Willie Hoppe, nor Babe Ruth, nor Walter Hagen, nor Bobby Jones, though Robert Elijah Jones, D.D., LL.D., a Methodist bishop, has thirty-four lines.

But go plow into the fat red volume for yourself. You will find it immensely interesting. And you will unearth some of the queerest notables you ever heard of—authors of books that no one ever reads, founders of movements that have vanished into thin air, pastors of remote Little Bethels in the Bible and No-More-Scrub-Bulls Belt, obscure and highly dubious Congressmen, judges of hedge courts, presidents of ninth-rate corporations. "Who's Who in America," it seems to me, is extraordinarily hospitable to gentlemen of the sacred calling; it lists at least four times as many of them as all of its foreign contemporaries combined. Any Baptist preacher who has edited a denominational Käseblatt and written a few pious pamphlets seems to be eligible, and so are all the more decorous kinds of uplifters. A prefatory article, reprinted from the 1924-25 edition, shows that the sons of clergymen run far ahead of all other Americans in the qualities which make for eminence—that is, as the editor of "Who's Who" defines it. I should like to see these figures analyzed by a competent statistician, preferably a heathen one. I incline to believe that investigation would show that they prove nothing at all. But go study them for yourself. And then take a browse through "Who's Who." It is full of surprising and instructive things—for example, that Arthur Hopkins' middle name is Melancton, that Hermann Hagedorn, the patriot-poet, is both a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters and a Moose, and that it takes seventy-one lines to describe the life and heroic deeds of James K. Hackett, the actor, exactly four and eleven-fifteenths times as many as it takes to tell all about Dr. Alexis Carrel. One also learns that the Hon. Herbert Hoover has twenty-eight learned degrees, that Gloria Swanson's actual maiden name was Swanson, and that the Hon. John Garibaldi Sargent, LL.D., Attorney-General of the United States, is a member of Zeta Psi. Finally, one learns that Ethel Barrymore is a brave woman as well as a charming one, for she gives the exact date of her birth, boldly and with obvious accuracy, thus separating herself in yet one more way from the vast majority of her sisters of the stage.

THE AMERICAN MERCURY AUTHORS

HERBERT ASBURY's first book, "Up From Methodism," was published recently.

BENJAMIN DECASSERES is the author of "The Shadow-Eater," "Forty Immortals," "Mirrors of New York" and other books. He has been translated into French by Rémy de Gourmont. He is now living in New York.

BERNARD DE VOTO is an instructor of English at Northwestern University. His novel, "The Chariot of Fire," has just appeared.

L. M. HUSSEY is a Philadelphia chemist. His first novel, "Odalisque," will appear next month.

ROBINSON JEFFERS' recently published "Roan Stallion, Tamar and Other Poems" has placed him in the front rank of modern American poets. He is living in California.

H. M. KALLEN, Ph.D. (Harvard), was a pupil of William James, and has taught philosophy at Harvard, Clark and Wisconsin and at the New School for Social Research. He has published many philosophical works.

HUGH KENT was formerly managing editor of the New York Morning Telegraph.

WILLIAM C. MURPHY, JR., is a Washington newspaper man, now chief of the Senate staff of the United States Daily. He was formerly with the Washington Post and the Washington Bureau of the N. C. W. C. News Service.

K. C. MCINTOSH is a commander in the Navy Supply Corps. During the occupation of Haiti he served on board the U. S. S. Tennessee, flagship of Rear Admiral Caperton.

WILLIAM SEAGLE's article in this issue is part of a book on the antics of the legislative mind, that is soon to be published.

ROSCOE SPENCER is a Virginian and a graduate of the Johns Hopkins Medical School. He is now living in Washington.

RUTH SUCKOW's "Iowa Interiors," a collection of short stories, has just been published. She is also the author of two novels, "Country People" and "The Odyssey of a Nice Girl."

RAY T. TUCKER was born in Holyoke, Mass., and graduated from Yale in 1915. He is now Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Post.

WILLIAM WEIMAR is a native of New York, and for a time attended Columbia. He is now a salesman of abrasive products.

ELEANOR ROWLAND WEMBRIDGE (Mrs. HARRY WEMBRIDGE), Ph.D. (Radcliffe), is now the woman referee of the Juvenile Court of Cleveland. She is the author of "The Right to Believe," "Other People's Daughters" and other books.

PARKHURST WHITNEY is a former newspaper man now writing for the magazines.

Rain and Telephone Calls

THE annual rain fall in the United States would weigh over three and one-half trillions of tons.

This vast weight is drawn up to the clouds by the unseen but effective power of the sun; representing energy equivalent to 300 billion horse-power.

The annual telephone conversations total over twenty-five billion a year. As silently as sunlight, electricity, mastered by the human mind, carries the voices of the nation.

There must be the man-power of 300,000 individuals to build, maintain and operate the telephone system.

There must be the money-power of over seven hundred million dollars a year to pay for operating the plant, in addition to three billion dollars invested in the plant.

The rain sustains life; the telephone furnishes swift communication for the nation, and they are alike in requiring a vast amount of unseen energy.

November	51,500	69,000	100,000
December	55,500	74,000	105,000

The magazine was begun very modestly. The print order for the first issue was but 10,000 copies. These were sold out at once, and the magazine was put back on the press. The 3,000 additional copies thus printed were also sold at once, and subsequently 2500 more were run off. This first issue, despite the two reprintings, has been long out of print, and copies bring a premium today. So do copies of the second issue. The subsequent issues, however, are all still obtainable—all, that is, with the exception of those for June and September, 1924, July and August, 1925, and April, 1926. The last-named was the issue that the Watch and Ward Society of Boston, and after that the Post Office, endeavored to suppress. When these efforts were defeated orders for copies of it flowed in by the thousand. But it was not reprinted.

When the publication of the magazine was first announced, in August, 1923, persons interested were given an oppor-

the leaping mind*

A clear mind is conditioned on regular clearance of the body. Delay or irregularity in the clearance of residual waste burdens the system with poisons which the blood-stream absorbs and carries to every organ of the body. Little ills, big ills, ills of the mind and even of the imagination often can be traced to intestinal inactivity.

A half glass of water sparkling with a dash of ENO will beneficially influence the removal of poisonous waste from the alimentary canal. ENO contains nothing drastic nor of uncertain value, and no sugar.

tunity to subscribe in advance. The responses numbered 3,033 by January 1, 1924. Some of these Founder Subscribers have since died, and a few have dropped off the list, but the rest remain. In addition, many other annual subscribers have come in, and the number at this writing (October 30, 1926) is more than 22,834. The rest of the circulation of the magazine is made up of sales on news-stands and in book-shops. The proportion of readers who are annual subscribers shows a tendency to rise steadily. The number increased by 3048 during 1926.

The preponderance of editors, journalists and other professional writers will be noted. But it will also be noted that the contributors to the magazine during the past three years have likewise included sixteen business men, eight lawyers, twelve medical men, and thirty-five professors. The specialties professed by the professors are given in the following table:

Anthropology	1
Biology	2
Chemistry	1
Economics	1
English	14
History	8
Law	2
Mathematics	1
Music	1
Philosophy	2
Sociology	1

In addition there has been one article by a university dean. The occupations of the sixty-one women who have contributed to the magazine follow:

In Mr. de Rochemont's article, "The Tabloids," printed in October, was the following:

The future of the tabloid press in America is a matter of dispute. It has been predicted recently by Carr V. Van Anda, of the New York Times, that in a few years all the daily newspapers will be forced to adopt the tabloid form.

Mr. Van Anda writes in to say that the ascription of this prophecy to him was an error. He says:

I have never held or expressed such an opinion, nor do I know of any standard newspaper that

You May Now Study Piano
Under These Renowned Artists---

JOSEF HOFMANN
MORIZ ROSENTHAL
BENNO MOISEVITSCH

If you possess that hard-to-define but easily recognizable something called talent, The Curtis Institute of Music has made it possible for you to study under Mr. Hofmann and other distinguished members of its Piano Department.

The seeking out of unusual talent is the first consideration of this school. To students who can qualify, the Institute offers complete musical and cultural courses in preparation for the concert stage or for teaching. For brilliance of attainment, its faculty is probably unrivaled by any musical institution in the world.

Through its endowment, The Curtis Institute of Music is fortunately removed from commercial considerations. For those who can pay, tuition fees are very moderate. To those of exceptional talent who cannot pay, financial exemption is granted.

For further information address

OF MUSIC

628 RITTENHOUSE SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

The various Departments of The Curtis Institute of Music are under the personal direction and supervision of the following members of its faculty:

Marcella Sembrich, Voice; Josef Hofmann, Piano; Carl Flesch, Violin; Louis Bailly, Viola; Felix Salmond, Violoncello; Carlos Salzedo, Harp; Leopold Stokowski, Orchestra; Reginald O. Morris, Composition, Theory, etc.

fears any such result from tabloid competition. As an illustration of the confidence of tabloid newspapers in their future I may add that I am at this moment taking part in an inspection of a paper-making enterprise one such newspaper is engaged in, which comprehends operations over a tract of 5,000 square miles of woodland, operations that are designed soon to produce more than twice the quantity of paper it is now using.

A leading merchant and high official of the Chamber of Commerce in his town sends in this interesting note, which may suggest an article to some reader:

The professional sociologists and political pathologists of a hundred years hence will probably notice it in retrospect, but all who have eyes can easily see that there is arising a new social phenomenon in our midst which is of the utmost significance. I refer to the slickum-haired, wide-trousered and white-gloved ushers who officiate at the movie palaces. They are multiplying like rabbits, and I understand that there is a move on foot to organize them into a guild, or mystic lodge. They do not perform merely in the metropolitan scenario temples. They can be found even in the little shows of the jerk-towns of Arkansas, of Wyoming—everywhere. No movie-house operator, indeed, however small, would think of getting along without them.

It is true that the seats of their pants are invariably dirty. But the business geniuses will take care of that. It is true that they do not always exude very pleasant odors. But Service Engineers will surely put their great minds to that, and before long it will be all right. The important point is that they are here, and that they are here to stay.

It seems to me that they are possible only in a democracy such as ours, wherein the common man, who in his own heart knows different, is always exalted and told that the world is his. His actual condition, his utter slavery, is too dreadful for him to contemplate. The chasm between his paper rights and his real possessions is appalling. As usual in such situations, opiates arise. The gospel of Service is one of them. Dr. Frank Craneism is another. And I suggest that these slick movie ushers

A Biological View of Prohibition

LONGEVITY

By Raymond Pearl

Director of the Institute for Biological Research, Johns Hopkins University

Questions:

1. What is the effect upon the duration of human life of (a) the consumption of moderate amounts of alcohol, and (b) the consumption of large amounts of this substance, as compared with (c) total abstinence from it?
2. What is the effect of alcohol upon the race? Does it lead to deterioration or degeneration? Or, on the other hand, is it beneficial in its effect upon the race? And, in either event, what is the probable explanation?

Method of Investigation:

Life tables are presented for persons known to have been respectively total abstainers, moderate drinkers, and heavy drinkers. These statistics were collected especially for Dr. Pearl's investigation, by trained statisticians, and calculated exactly as by life insurance companies.

Results:

By means of these life tables it is shown that there are definitely deleterious effects of heavy drinking upon longevity, but the life tables for moderate drinkers are not greatly different from those for total abstainers. What difference there is points to slightly greater longevity in the moderate drinkers than in the abstainers. Dr. Pearl further demonstrates that moderate use of alcohol has a beneficial effect upon the race, probably due to elimination by alcohol of weak and defective reproductive cells.

In view of the extreme interest of the subject and the multitude of popular misconceptions, ALCOHOL AND LONGEVITY is indispensable to an educated American's library. It cannot be neglected by the economist, the sociologist, the psychologist, the publicist, or the man of affairs who wishes to keep in touch with the latest developments regarding this important question.

are a third. It is no small matter for a corner groceryman and his shiny-faced spouse, with her hair still wet, to be escorted to their four-bits' seats by a smiling and courtesying lackey. Such things do more for the peace of a nation than a million McNary-Haughen bills or Sherman anti-trust laws.

The following gloss on Mr. Chester Crowell's article, "A Glance at the Public Schools," in the August issue, comes from a young reader in Brooklyn:

I am a bit over sixteen and go to one of the Brooklyn high-schools. The greatest trouble, it seems to me, lies with the teachers, most of them sound enough when it comes to ordinary routine teaching, but absolutely ignorant of psychology. In opinions most of them (save for a few daring young things, just out of the cloisters) are full twenty-five years behind the times.

There is a lady in my school who is the so-called "faculty adviser" of the school paper. I tried my hand at a few namby-pamby book reviews for two terms; I covered a varied list: Van Vechten's "Firecrackers," Firbank's "Vainglory," "Manhattan Transfer," Dreiser's "An American Tragedy," Arthur Machen, Sherwood Anderson, "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes," and as many other new books as I could get. Well, except for a few pleas for one review a week with a long outline of the story—"You know, you're not addressing people who usually read book reviews. You must write for your audience of boys and girls," or words to that effect—nothing whatever was said to me by the adviser . . . until a few weeks ago.

Then Miss W— gave me a twenty minute lecture on Good Literature, as represented in her eyes by James Lane Allen: "I have all his books." Among other choice things I learned (1) that Dreiser is not American; (2) that Heywood Brown is a moral pervert—she gave up reading the World because he is on the staff, and burned one of his books; (3) that Good Literature is necessarily pure, unadulterated, and 100% American; (4) that my criticism (what there was of it) was not worth two red cents because it was destructive for the most part, and Good Criticism is always constructive and nothing else; and (5) variation on No. 3. We do not read Dreiser, Anderson, Hecht and the rest of the realists, it appears, for pleasure.

"When we go out for an automobile ride, do we ride in the sewers, in the slums, among the waste and garbage? NO!" That was the lady's dictum. When I answered "Anything and everything" to her question about my reading, she started anew; that was just what I should not do. I should read all the good old books. "'Tom Jones'?" I asked, for it is a restricted book in the Brooklyn Public Library and up to that time it had not reached me. The good woman was horrified. "No! That's just the sort of book you shouldn't read!" She was certainly emphatic about it. Naturally I've read Fielding since—and why he should shock her or be restricted I can't see. Those faintly purple passages! . . . Good Lord! Poor Miss W—!

A reader, temporarily residing in Pittsburgh, the home town of Andy Mellon, the modern Hamilton and one of the greatest financial geniuses and public servants of all time, has of late been somewhat disturbed over a certain problem in militant theology:

I am at a loss to know—though some may wonder at my perplexity—who is the "Son of God" in the oft-sung Christian hymn:

The Son of God goes forth to war
A kingly crown to gain.

His blood red banner streams afar . . .

or words to that effect. We are thus exhorted to follow one alleged to be the Son of God, but one who is obviously not the Christ known to us through the New Testament. The spectacle of Jesus Christ on the war-path is grotesque. Who, then, is this war-lord whom we are exhorted to follow? Conceivably he is the same as the one followed by the churches in the late war. Certainly the sentiment of the hymn is consistent with the attitude of the organized Protestant Churches in that uplifting conflict. But it should be apparent to all who are in any way familiar with the life of Jesus Christ that He, the Son of God, was anything but a warrior. The idea of His posing as a sort of divine field marshal is absurd. Who, I repeat, is the pretender? I suspect that his followers outnumber those of the true Son.

CHRISTMAS BOOK NUMBER

A Memorable Season

THE Borzoi list has never before included, in one season, so many American books of permanent vitality—books which are widely read at the time of publication, and which will continue to be widely read many years hence.

Ten years ago, there was an immitigable cleavage, in American literature, between literary value and popular appeal. The two elements were not known to exist between the covers of one book; and the national letters were vociferously deplored by a rising group of critics. Then, in the autumn of 1917, Alfred A. Knopf published a novel by Joseph Hergesheimer called THE THREE BLACK PENNYS. It was recognized at the time by readers of discernment as a work of enduring merit: what is more, its celebrity spread. Hundreds of copies are still sold every year, and THE THREE BLACK PENNYS remains a landmark in American literature.

There have been other landmarks, between the publication of THE THREE BLACK PENNYS and that of Mr. Hergesheimer's latest novel, TAM-

PICO, too numerous to mention. Willa Cather's ONE OF OURS, the Pulitzer Prize novel for 1922; Carl Van Vechten's delicious, original PETER WHIFFLE; James Stevens's American epics, PAUL BUNYAN and BRAWNYMAN; such books as Katharine Anthony's biography of CATHERINE THE GREAT (which has just entered its seventh large printing), Joseph Wood Krutch's EDGAR ALLAN POE, and Thomas Beer's THE MAUVE DECADE, flourishing throughout the United States—these are a few of the American landmarks which bear the Borzoi imprint.

Four of America's foremost novelists—Willa Cather, Elinor Wylie, Joseph Hergesheimer, and Carl Van Vechten—are represented on the Borzoi list for this fall, with novels which in each instance stand among the author's best.

TAMPICO is Joseph Hergesheimer's greatest novel in years—a thrilling story of the Mexican oil-fields, an American business man, and his subordinate's wife. Thus far, CY THEREA has been the most popular of Joseph Herges-

The Season's Greetings

INTELLIGENT Christmas shoppers realize more and more that the season's greetings can most easily and most satisfactorily be accomplished with books; and the Borzoi is anxious to give, with his own season's greetings, suggestions to his friends who contemplate doing their Christmas shopping in the bookstores. No one can read all the interesting books, yet to give books that one has not read is taking a chance. One man's meat may be another's poison, in books as elsewhere; and your friends who are reading one of the subtler successes, like THE MAUVE DECADE, may not be interested in the novel of the month, or even in the worthiest book on politics or economics. Apart from a few books that will be welcome everywhere—MY MORTAL ENEMY by Willa Cather, TAMPICO by Joseph Hergesheimer, NIGGER HEAVEN by Carl Van Vechten, THE ORPHAN ANGEL by Elinor Wylie—it is more satisfactory to make the book fit the reader.

For example, the man who has borrowed your copy of The American Mercury will presumably enjoy NOTES ON DEMOCRACY by H. L. Mencken. This is one of Mr. Mencken's most important books. He has been at work on it for ten years and has produced something even more devastating and illuminating than his books customarily are. Every one who reads The American Mercury will also like Herbert Asbury's autobiographical description of religious intolerance in a small town, called UP FROM METHODISM.

For your literary friends whose taste runs to the unusual, the perfectly written book, there is KYRA KYRALINA by Panait Istrati, a book of connected stories combining the adventurous material of a modern Arabian Night with the subtleties and psychological insight of the most sophisticated French raconteur. Georg Brandes, the dean of European critics, says that Istrati has long been his favorite among European writers.

Two splendid bedside books are Mr. Mencken's new series of PREJUDICES, the Fifth, and AMERICANA, 1926, the latter gleanings from the familiar department of The American Mercury. The five volumes of PREJUDICES can now be had in a Gift Edition, boxed, and bound in Borzoi Batik.

Your musical friends will be delighted with Ernest Newman's edition of THIRTY YEARS' MUSICAL RECOLLECTIONS by Henry Chorley, who was musical critic for The Athenaeum from 1830 to 1860. His anecdotes of the music and musicians of that generation will be of the highest interest for the concert or opera goer today. Recollections of Verdi, Donizetti, Wagner, and Jenny Lind abound, and his work, as Ernest Newman says, "contains many a sobering lesson for the musical criticism of this or any future time."

All husbands, brothers, or friends who are Masons will be glad to have THE SECRET TRADITION IN ALCHEMY by Arthur Edward Waite, a scientific investigation of the spiritual and symbolical significance of "the one branch so far unexplored of that which has claimed to constitute theosophy in Christ."

For your mechanically minded friends there is the only up-to-date biography of the greatest inventor of all time, THOMAS A. EDISON. His biographer, George S. Bryan, has given a completely intelligible account of Edison's achievements, as well as an unforgettable picture of the man.

For those who appreciate the interesting curiosities of history there are two books in particular, THE LIFE OF ALONSODE CONTRERAS, written by himself in the sixteenth century, and A HISTORY OF WITCHCRAFT AND DEMONOLOGY by Montague Summers. The subject of witchcraft has seldom, if ever, been examined, except in the antiquarian and romantic reports which drew untrustworthy pictures. Mr. Summers has examined the evidence to show the witch as she really was: a member of a powerful secret organization hostile to church and society. Alonso de Contreras was a man of multifarious activity and apparently universal ability. He was at various times a valet, a soldier, a sailor, an executioner, a pirate, a judge, a governor, and a hermit; and his memoirs give the best picture of Oriental adventure in the sixteenth century, a thing which has perhaps been too much overshadowed by contemporary western conquest.

There are four books for the playgoer. The first of these is THE MEMOIRS OF CARLO GOLDONI, the foremost among Italian dramatists, whose life practically covered the entire eighteenth century and whose memoirs depict not only the stage of the time but also the highest diplomatic and social circles of Italy. DAVID by D. H. Lawrence retells the Biblical story of David and Saul. CAKE by Witter Bynner is a gorgeous piece of satire, involving a restless woman and her attempts to have a satisfactory adventure. THE HOUSE OF SATAN is the title which George Jean Nathan gives both to the theatre and his new book of characteristic essays in general criticism.

For the poetry lover there is THE GHOST IN THE ATTIC by George S. Bryan, which is equally for those who love the New England countryside and understand the New England rural character; FLYING FISH by Grace Hazard Conkling; and Emory Holloway's life of WHITMAN. For those whose taste in poetry inclines to the East there is a new book of aphorisms by Kahlil Gibran, SAND AND FOAM, and a gift edition of his most popular book, THE PROPHET, set by hand, with illustrations in colotype.

For bright children an abridged, illustrated edition of MOBY DICK has just been published. This will also serve excellently for grown persons who have intended all their lives to read Herman Melville's masterpiece and never got around to it.

For those who travel, in fact or in imagination, THE PERAMBULATOR IN EDINBURGH is particularly designed. A year ago James Bone wrote THE LONDON PERAMBULATOR, which interpreted the atmosphere of London as charmingly as it described the landmarks. Mr. Bone has done the same thing this year for the heart of Midlothian. To travelers who prefer sunnier countries and warmer climates René Jula's CONCERNING CORSICA will be welcome, with its eight full-color illustrations by Jan Jula.

To return nearer home, any member of your City Council should read Claude Bragdon's ARCHITECTURE AND DEMOCRACY, which is being reissued in a special edition for the Reading-with-a-Purpose Series of the American Library Association.

From THE PERAMBULATOR IN EDINBURGH

Anyone on the point of building a house, and all who are interested in decoration, will find stimulation in Joseph Hergesheimer's FROM AN OLD HOUSE, a record of his Pennsylvania Dutch farmhouse, built in 1721 and finished in 1924.

For golfers, who can think of nothing else during the winter but the return of spring and the chance to improve their score, THE FIFTH ESTATE by James R. Crowell and Jerome D. Travers will provide entertainment. This book tells the story of golf in America from 1886 to this day. Other sportsmen, particularly riders to hounds, will appreciate LEICESTERSHIRE AND ITS HUNTS and NIMROD'S HUNTING TOURS. These books will be distinguished additions to any sportsman's library.

To the social worker William H. Smyth's CONCERNING IRASCIBLE STRONG will give data on the evolution of human nature in a humorous, unconventional manner, and will show how the simplest traits of our earliest ancestors have elaborated themselves into the qualities that cause discontent and unsatisfactory conditions today.

An eminent doctor's book which should be read by every one who has ever had a cold, or a toothache, is WHY INFECTIONS? by Nicholas Kopeloff, describing the conditions that determine the need for operation in teeth, tonsils, and other organs.

For the business man Herbert F. Fraser's book, FOREIGN TRADE AND WORLD POLITICS, will be a valuable study of the international foundations of prosperity. And for the editorial writer and rising politician James K. Pollock's PARTY CAMPAIGN FUNDS will clarify one of the most serious issues of domestic politics, the issue of campaign expenditure.

Don't forget yourself! A valuable addition to your own library will be THE COLLECTED NOVELS AND STORIES OF DE MAUPASSANT, edited by Ernest Boyd, complete in eighteen volumes. Critics have left no doubt that this is the best edition of De Maupassant available in English. GUY DE MAUPASSANT, a biography by Ernest Boyd, tops off the series and tells the story of the man whose own stories have held countless readers the world over.

The Spiral, the Circle, et al.

ABOUT fifteen years ago, Adolfo Best-Maugard, a young Mexican artist, was engaged by Professor Franz Boas, at that time excavating among the ancient Indian ruins of Mexico, to make drawings of the findings. The artist made the drawings—2000 of them—and then made a discovery of his own which the archaeologist had missed. He noticed that in all his drawings he was using never more than seven fundamental lines. Further inspection of the originals revealed the fact that the ancient Aztecs, Toltecs and Mayans had used no more in the creation of their designs and sculptures. Here, plainly, was a lead that might repay investigation. He found that the popular arts of present-day Mexico are equally parsimonious in their use of motifs and, in their own way, of an equally surprising beauty in design. The new explorer of uncharted seas plunged intrepidly on through a seemingly interminable study of primitive arts—Greek, Egyptian, Persian, Indian, Chinese, African, American Indian, Scandinavian, Russian—as well as of modern popular arts all over the world. The net result of his findings confirmed his original suspicion—that primitive man or the present-day peasant, seeking self-expression in plastic art, instinctively resorts to the use of the seven fundamental motifs or symbols in the compositions of his designs.

From A METHOD FOR CREATIVE DESIGN

Here was no dull fact to add to the accumulated store of archaeological knowledge, but a psychological truth of the greatest importance in the development of art. From this point on, the way was clear. If primitive man could create beautiful and significant paintings and sculptures with the seven motifs, why should not children today be taught the art of design in the same manner? Why, in fact, should not any one? Finding no reasonable objection, Best-Maugard evolved his method. He wrote a book. That book was printed by the Mexican Government and a special department in the Ministry of Education was created for the author to demonstrate the practicability of his system. Under his supervision, the teaching of design in all the Mexican schools was completely revolutionized and half a million students in that country have since studied under the new method. The author was invited to lecture at the University of California. Three thousand new students of the method are the result of those lectures.

The English edition of his book, which is here presented to the American public, has been completely revised, re-written and in large part expanded. The

For Winter Reading

EVERY one knows what summer novels are. They should be short, rapid, and not too profound—capable of being absorbed by a wandering attention. There are likewise books made for winter—books which absorb for hours at a time the interest of the reader who, in any case, wants to sit out a long evening without moving. These books take him to another, and a complete world; introduce him to crowds of interesting new people, who share with him several years of their lives.

Such a book is G. B. Stern's new novel, A DEPUTY WAS KING. The London Times says of it:

"Miss G. B. Stern has now got a firm grip on the Rakonitz family; and while she is chronicling the lives of the post-war generation in A DEPUTY WAS KING she moves readily backwards in time to adorn her tale with illustrations and parallels from the earlier history of the vast cosmopolitan tribe. They are a fascinating family to read about. . . . Miss Stern can produce picture after picture richly characteristic of the race and the family she is describing; a tumultuous, complicated, enormous group is now known to her in such intimate detail that her difficulty must be to discard from her wealth of material. She keeps admirable control, and she has never written more vividly.

"Crowds of people come into the story, each one distinct, but the outstanding figures are Toni Rakonitz, the successful business woman, proprietor of 'Toni's' in Hanover-square, where smart frocks are created, and Loraine, her cousin, equally brilliant, and a liar on a most magnificent scale. . . . In a book that is packed closely with careful and relevant detail, one cannot fairly outline the plot; it demands absorbed reading."

heimer's novels, principally because its setting is contemporary and its theme modern. TAMPICO shares these advantages, and tells an unusual story of conquest and passion.

As for NIGGER HEAVEN, as soon as everyone got over his surprise that Carl Van Vechten had written a tragic novel, commendations began to pour in. James Branch Cabell, Sinclair Lewis, Anita Loos, F. Scott Fitzgerald and Ellen Glasgow all agree that NIGGER HEAVEN is Carl Van Vechten's best novel. Several years ago, when Negro spirituals and Negro art first became widely known, it was predicted that a novel should be written to interpret the amazing, inscrutable field of Negro life. NIGGER HEAVEN is that novel; and every reader is an enthusiast.

Willa Cather's new book, MY MORTAL ENEMY, is the concise story of a woman's life and the astounding study of her heart. More in the mood of A LOST LADY than of any other among her novels, MY MORTAL ENEMY will be called Miss Cather's best story by many readers for its picture of nineteenth-century New York, its subtle revelation of a marriage, and the direct, unforgettable manner of its telling. MY MORTAL ENEMY is published in a beautiful edition, designed by W. A. Dwiggins and printed under the supervision of the Pynson Printers.

Elinor Wylie, author of JENNIFER LORN and THE VENETIAN GLASS NEPHEW, has surpassed herself in THE ORPHAN ANGEL, a book of charm and fantasy, which supposes that a great English literary genius who was reported dead a century ago eluded his actual fate and came to America. The identity of the central character is going to be the subject of widespread and absorbing speculation, and the story, imaginative, humorous, and wise, will be a delight to many generations of readers.

And don't overlook two new and significant American biographies, a definitive life of WHITMAN, and a life of EDISON, which is unique in that it brings the subject to date. Professor Emory Holloway has written a narrative embodying all the known facts of Whitman's life from his first flights as Editor of the Brooklyn Eagle to the last, tragic days at Camden. He shows the facts of the poet's life to be even more interesting than the romantic fictions which have been woven around him.

EDISON: THE MAN AND HIS WORK, by George S. Bryan, is a full-length portrait and a fascinating, intelligible record of the inventions which have done more to change western living than the achievements of any other living individual. Mr. Bryan has made ample use of rare and unpublished materials to fill with dignity and seeming permanence a place taken by nothing else on the subject.

These are books that will be in the library of every American who follows the development of his own literature. Not one of them is ephemeral. Each of them has done something that has never been done before: the romance of American commercial imperialism, the interpretation of metropolitan Negro life, the complete, definitive lives of two of America's greatest men.

The BORZOI Barometer

ONE of the measures of a book's success is the number of its editions. On the Borzoi fall list, new editions are frequent. SORRELL AND SON by Warwick Deeping has just gone into its fourteenth printing; THE MAUVE DECADE by Thomas Beer, into its seventh; HOT SATURDAY by Harvey Fergusson, into the third; Katharine Anthony's biography of CATHERINE THE GREAT, into the seventh; THE PROPHET by Kahlil Gibran, into the ninth; STEPHEN CRANE by Thomas Beer, into the fourth; NIGGER HEAVEN by Carl Van Vechten, into the sixth; and MY MORTAL ENEMY, Willia Cather's new book, went into its third edition before publication.

SEX IN MAN AND ANIMALS, by John R. Baker, has just been published. The author is a member of the Department of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy of the University Museum, Oxford, and his book gives an up-to-date account of the main facts and theories of sexual reproduction, its determination and artificial control. Professor Julian Huxley says in his preface: "I welcome this little book and wish it many readers. It is written in the simplest language and presented in the most straightforward way."

James Stevens, author of PAUL BUNYAN and BRAWNYMAN, has recently passed through New York, bringing the manuscript of his new book, MATTOCK, which will be published in the Spring. MATTOCK tells of a young man brought up a Methodist and his experiences with the A. E. F.

THE AMERICAN MERCURY

Today's trend in motor car buying

The overwhelming success of the Hupmobile Eight—in sales as well as in mechanism and performance — has helped to bring about a new trend in motor car buying.

The plain fact is that Hupmobile has got out of the eight-cylinder principle more than that principle had ever before been made to yield.

It is by no mere chance that Hupmobile builds into this Eight an airplane type of mechanism which costs far more than the ordinary, and retains its quiet and efficiency.

That one fact is significant of this eight's new kind of performance and stamina; of its utterly remarkable ability to respond perfectly month after month to every call upon it.

It is by no mere chance, either, that the Hupmobile Eight is more economical of gasoline than most sixes of comparable size.

Gasoline economy, oil economy—but above all, economy of maintenance—were designed into the car by those who have for upward of twenty years studied the principles of eight-cylinder construction.

Its low cost of operation and maintenance is of equal effectiveness with this car's performance and its amazingly low price, in establishing the rapidly growing preference for this new kind of eight-cylinder car.

Drive any Hupmobile Eight in city traffic and on the highway. You will then agree—with enthusiasm—that no American car equals this Hupmobile performance.
